Low grades and common Tobacco can be grown almost anywhere and never pay any profit to any one. The selection and preparation of the land for fine Tobacco is of the first importance, and the selection of a fertilizer specially suited to the land, climate, length of season, adapted to the growth, maturity and curing of Tobacco, is very nearly of equal importance. Parties using

.$1 00 to 1 20 last year did not get their Tobacco frostbitten because it ripened early, and was cut and cured before the frost came. When a man goes to buy a horse he is governed by his age, size and condition, and especially his adaptation to the particular work to be per formed, thus recognizing that there is a difference in horses. Not so with some men which are no more alike than horses, yet with them a fertilizer is a fertilizer, and all all they ask is the price and if low enough they buy, the result being generally a poor quality of Tobacco, low prices, complaint of hard times, complaint against the Tobacco Warehouses, Tobacco buyers and the fertilizers. The same parties will in all prebability next season look "around" and buy a new brand of cheap fertilizer and thus continue from year to year, and as they change the brands of fertilizers change to suit the prices they want. THIS IS NOT TRUE of a large majority of the best farmers who year after year use the
