THE GALLANT PELHAM.

From the Houston (Texas) Journal.
Where is there a soldier of the old army, who was on the heights of Fredericksburg, but can recollect the hero, young Pelham, fighting his guns in front of Franklin's corps. One thrill of admiration ran throughout the army, and the great hero, as brave as he was modest, had his reward in the general orders of Gen. Lee of the battle, when he styled him "the gallant Pelham," a name that was at once adopted throughout the army. The sublimity of this compliment is enhanced by the fact that he was the only one ever mentioned by Gen. Lee in general orders, under the rank of a General.

We watched him fighting with unremitting ardor the guns that he commanded.— Now firing, now retreating, and then returning almost to the very line of the returning foe—at each discharge a silver line of white would gleam where the line of blue had before stood. It was a grand and terrific sight. We could hear all around the shouts of our men as they cried: "See how he fights. Who is it? What a soldier! It is Pelham!" and cheer after cheer went up when making his stand near the centre of the field, he fought until nearly every horse he had was killed, and the men torn to fragments by shot and shell. Then we understood his work, for gliding to the right of us came Stonewall Jackson's and A. P. Hill's corps, and the lines collided. Pelham's work was done, and General Lee, in presence of his corps commanders and his staff made the remark, "Is it not a wonder how one so young can be so brave?" This compliment brought from him only a blush upon his beardless cheek.

Brave and heroic heart, we saw him fall in the front of Averill's fierce surprise. He was leading to the front some stragglers, and endeavoring to rally a broken line, his fine sabre glistening in patriotic circles over his head, and his clear voice cheering up each weary heart to one more honest effort, when a shell burst over his head, and one fragment went hissing through his brow. He fell, and for a moment there was a pause. Stuart for a moment stopped and looked at him, and said in a solemn tone, the tears trickling from his eyes, "Serving on my staff is fatal—it is fatal."

The following narrative of Harry Gilmore tells the rest of the close of this pure good life:
" He was taken from the field by Col. Harry Gilmore, laid upon his horse and placed in charge of two dismounted men with orders to carry him to an ambulance and call a surgeon. Col. Gilmore thus relates in his book, entitled "Four Years in the Saddle," the subsequent fate and brutal treatment of one of the noblest spirits that perished for the "Lost cause."

"On my way to Culpeper, I overtook, near Brandy Station, the two men I had placed in charge of Pelham, making their way back to Culpeper, with the body across the horse, just as they had started from the field of battle, his head and hands hanging down on one side, his legs on the other—face, hair and hands soaked and clotted with mud and blood.

"Overwhelmed with horror, I had him laid on the grass in the fence corner, and then, to my astonishment, found him still alive. Imagine my indignation and vented wrath, when I found that instead of looking for an ambulance, a distance of eight miles, of which they had already accomplished. I firmly believe that had surgical aid been called to remove the compression on the brain, his life might have been saved.

"An ambulance was immediately sent for him, and by the time I had dispatched my business with the telegraph, Pelham had arrived in town, and was at once conveyed to Bessie's home, where the ladies had all things in readiness for his reception. Three surgeons were soon in attendance; and after, by gentle hands he had been washed with warm water, his feet and hands swathed in flannel, and some brandy poured in his month, the surgeons commenced relieving the compression on the brain. The piece of shell that had struck him was not larger than the end of my little finger. It entered just at the curl of the hair on the back of the head, making through the skull without even piercing the brain, coming out two inches below the point where it had entered. The skull was badly shattered between the entrance and the exit of the shell. As the surgeons removed the pieces, I selected one as a memento of one of the most gallant and highly esteemed officers of the Southern army. He was just 21 years of age.

The surgeons soon pronounced his case hopeless, and left him to the care of Bessie and myself—other friends crowded in.— About 1, p. m., his eyes opened—turned toward me with an unconscious look—closed them—drew a long breath, and died within a struggle. We dressed him in his best uniform, and had but just laid him on the bed, when the door was gently opened, and Stuart entered, having returned from the fight at Kelly's Ford. Great tears rolled down his cheeks as he silently gazed on the lifeless form, and then retired.

"Exhausted with fatigue, I lay down upon the floor, and slept soundly beside the mortal remains of a companion who had ridden to the field that morning in usually fine spirits; but such is the fortune of war."

This, indeed, perished a great and good lad. He was carried to his home in Alabama, and buried beneath her loved soil. In Richmond his body lay in state, and the ladies of the doomed city not only covered his coffin with wreaths of evergreens, immortelles and pure white roses, to designate the purity of his life, but they paid to the form—sans peur, sans reproche—the tribute of their tears. Everywhere on the way he was greeted with funeral honors, and the noble heart of Pelham passed into history as the type of that pure chivalry that glowed in the hearts of the youths of the army, and the loss of whom hath caused much mourning throughout the South.

I write the above, glad of the opportunity to bear my testimony, feeble as it is, to the virtue, to the honor, the peerless courage of the subject of this sketch.
Yours,
TROYL.
