"Does the court understand you to say, Mr. Jones, that you saw the editor of the Argus of Freedom intoxicated?" "Not at all sir; I merely said that I had seen him frequently so flurried in his mind that he would undertake to cut copy out with the snuffers, that's all."—American paper.

"I say, milkman, you give your cows too much salt!" "Why, how do you know how much salt I give them?" "I think I judge from the appearance of the milk you have brought us lately. Salt makes the cow dry, and then they drink too much water—that makes their milk thin, you know."

Iron Stakes for Grape-Vines.

BY JAMES LAMONT, GARDENER TO C. ZUG, ESQ., PITTSBURG, PA.

I have always been a lover of Grape culture, and I have been often grieved, going, after a great thunder storm, into the vineyard to see so many of the vines laid low and the stakes broken off by the ground, the vine and Grapes almost destroyed by the fall, and in some cases the sap vessels strained in such a manner that the sap will not flow so freely as before, and this besides involves a great deal of time in getting new stakes and making things as they were before the storm.

For this reason I have adopted iron instead of wood; and I am sure that an iron stake can be had nearly as cheap as a wooden one,

The stake that I would recommend for small growing vines, such as Delaware, Diana, &c., would be of half-inch iron, eight feet long—three feet in and five feet out of the ground.

To make the stakes,—eighteen inches from the ground put a cross piece, two feet long, where, at that point you have punched a hole one-sixteenth of an inch in diameter with which pass the two feet piece in through the stake far enough to fasten the piece in; when that is done turn each end of your cross piece up, say three inches, and that will keep the shoots from blowing over with the winds. The second piece, eighteen inches up, have punched for your next piece, only cross the direction. The third piece the same way and in the same direction as the first piece, and give each piece the turn on the ends; by this measurement you will see that you have eight inches above your last cross piece, and that will just answer for tying the vine to the stake—three ties will be enough—one just above each cross piece, and that will keep the vines from slipping down, as it often happens on wooden stakes.

To fasten the stake in the ground, dig out the ground as is done in putting in any stake or posts; when that is done take bricks ordered at the brickyard to be made with a hole through the centre of each brick to suit the size of your stake. It will take three for each stake. The one at the lower end of the post hole I think ought to be only holed half way through, so as to make a good, steady foundation to stand on, then put on two bricks holed through upon the stake, and set the stake with the end in the socket of the lower brick. Fill in the ground till you come up half way and then let your second brick fall into its place, and the third within three inches of the ground's level, and I think this will hold all strong and secure, and you will have a stake that will give satisfaction.

I would recommend two coats of paint all over the stake, both under and above the ground.

A friend of mine told me that he had his best grapes on wire trellises. He assured me that his favorite Grape, the Catawba, ripened better on that trellis than on a wooden one; so if this proves true in all cases we may soon have a rolling mill in Pittsburg making iron for that purpose, and I am sure I would rather see a mill making iron for supporting Grape vines than making plate to build gun-boats or iron-clads.

Mr. Editor, I hope next Summer to see this stake tried in numerous vineyards. I am sure they would favor such a stake instead of wood trellises. I think the vine likes to grow in a round head—such as on a tree—and in that shape the sun has more beneficial influence on the foliage, and the great point is to keep the main cane, and the fruit likewise, well covered from the sun by the foliage. Strong growing vines, such as Concord, Catawba, &c., will require stronger iron—three-quarters of an inch I think will be strong enough in all cases, and it might be six feet high above the ground, and four cross pieces. Every man can be his own stake-maker, painter and stake-setter.

This is a point for your Promological Societies to discuss; for anything that supports the vines which give us the Grapes, the noblest of all fruits, I think will be worth discussion.

Iron is often recommended to be put about trees to keep off blight, and it is, I have no doubt, just as good to keep off mildew from the vines; mildew is the greatest evil that follows the Grape vine.

[This is an excellent practical idea for making iron Grape trellises. The trouble with iron stakes has always been that without much labor they would not stand up. The idea of brick bottom may be carried to iron fences, and iron posts of every description. Thousands of "patents" have been paid for by millions of people, of much less value than this idea of Mr. Lamont's, which he gives our readers for nothing.—ED.]—Gardener's Monthly.

Steam Plows and Apparatus.

Western farmers are about to have an opportunity to see an experiment tried to test the adaptability of steam to our American agriculture. John Fowler & Co., of England, have sent out a complete set of their plowing apparatus, with engines and tackle, in charge of a skilled agent, and, at their own expense, are going to set it to work. It is said to be capable of plowing more than an acre an hour to a depth of twelve inches, and at a cost considerably less than horse and hand labor. The only objection seems to be the cost of the machinery, which is about $10,000; but there are many large farmers in the West and in California, who would invest this much if the plan proves feasible. The custom officers levied a duty of nearly $4,000 on this sample plow, but a joint resolution has been introduced in the House, by Mr. Bidwell, of the Agricultural Committee, to refund this, and it will undoubtedly pass without objection.

A Dutchman in Eufaula married a second wife a week after the loss of wife No. 1. The Sabbath following the bride asked her lord to take her riding, and was "cut up" with the following response: "You tink I ride out mit another woman so soon after the death of mine frau? No."

A new Episcopal College has been opened at Winchester, Tennessee. It has five professorships, four tutorships, and 100 students. It is a part of the university projected by the late Bishop Polk.

The wife of a poor artist died suddenly at Darlington, Pennsylvania, last week, and it was discovered that she and her husband had been subsisting on nothing but corn meal.

An old gentleman out West, who was living with his sixth wife, said there was never a woman born who could survive a great while if she had her own way in everything all the time.

At the Park Theatre, Brooklyn, a new entertainment is a mechanical and panoramic illustration of the great yacht race between the Henrietta, Fleetwing and Vesta.
