TEMPERANCE

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS

To the People of North Carolina:

At a recent session of the State Council of the Friends of Temperance, I had the honor of being chosen President of this body.

As such, I feel it my duty to address the people at large, throughout the State, in behalf of Temperance. I count it a high privilege to thus present to the people of North Carolina, a subject so important and so dear to the hearts of all who are earnestly engaged in the cause of reform. I do not mean to read this matter for their own consideration, but for the consideration of all who are interested in the cause of temperance, sobriety and good morals, all who desire to see the great and growing evil of intemperance rooted out from our land, all those who are disposed to aid in forwarding a great and good work, and all who are anxious to see our banners, or signs of their countenance, and lend us their assistance in advancing our cause.

The cause of temperance is an important one, and I may add, a flourishing one. It has been but a few years since the first temperance society was organized in the United States, and in the few years since that time, it has spread over the whole of our country, and has become one of the most prominent features of the age. It has become a source of pride and honor to our country, and has become a source of strength and support to our people. It has become a source of joy and happiness to our people, and has become a source of life and vigor to our nation.

The Order of the Friends of Temperance, which was organized in the year 1826, has become one of the most prominent features of the age. It has become a source of pride and honor to our country, and has become a source of strength and support to our people. It has become a source of joy and happiness to our people, and has become a source of life and vigor to our nation.

abominable, wicked careers, and restored to their families, reformed, steady men, thus making glad the hearts of those who were dependent upon them for their support.

But besides the actual good thus accomplished, the influence of the example set by the members of our society is most wholesome in its effects upon others. It not only forms an inducement to the intemperate to reform their evil, and abandon their evil, degrading habits, but it has a restraining effect upon those who may be disposed to indulge in intoxicating drinks, and to engage in a course of reckless dissipation.

Our is a noble work that of reclaiming men from drunkenness. The cause of temperance ranks second only to the work of spreading the Gospel of Christ and preaching the Word of God, for it has for its object the extirpation of one of the worst evils of society. It prevails to an alarming extent in almost every country under the sun. In every Christian country, the drunkard is a pest, and his presence is a disgrace to the community. He is a source of sorrow and grief to his family, and a source of shame and dishonor to his country.

themselves by intemperance, and straggled to them I would not be so far from saying, if not to work for the cause of temperance, at least for the purpose of setting a good example to others, and swelling our numbers, and thus increasing our influence for good.

I would appeal to the influential men in every part of our State to assist us in our work, either to become active or honorary members of our society, or by exerting the influence they may wield over others to induce them to become members of our organization. They could not engage in a more laudable cause.

Not only to the men, but to women I would appeal, who are ever ready to engage in any work, which has for its object the alleviation of suffering, or the rooting out of any vice or immorality that may exist among us. I would ask them to join our ranks, and to do more, to join our ranks, and to do more, to join our ranks, and to do more.
