For the South Atlantic and Gulf States, continued cold and generally cloudy weather will prevail, with light rain, and easterly winds veering to southerly. For the Gulf, continued high barometer on the South Atlantic Coast, and falling barometer in the lower Mississippi Valley and thence westward. For Tennessee and the Ohio Valley, partly cloudy weather, easterly or southerly winds, slowly rising temperature and falling barometer. For the Middle States and the lower Lake Region, clear or fair weather, a slight rise of temperature, variable winds shifting to southerly or westerly, and very high but slowly falling barometer during Friday. The lower Ohio and lower Mississippi rivers will rise during Friday.

The Anglo-Chinese city of Hong Kong appears to have some curious local customs. An English journal published there says: "It appears that the local authorities have recently ordered that pigs shall not be kept at all within the limits of the city, and, in consequence, pigs cannot be allowed to sleep in the rooms of their owners, several women were found who had met the difficulty by going to the newly erected pig-sty and sleeping with the pigs. As this was not considered an exactly proper place for them to sleep, they were apprehended and fined twenty-five cents each."

KALAKAUA.

It had been intended to visit the Produce and Cotton Exchanges and the Chamber of Commerce, as at each preparation had been made to receive them, but the lateness of the start in the morning compelled an abandonment of this plan, and it was resolved to make a dash for the Stock Exchange and catch the exhibition there before adjournment. All day long the brokers had indulged in a general hat-ensharing crusade; rushes and hatting had been carried on to the fullest extent. The King, however, managed to gain the platform by a side passage before the brokers were aware of his arrival. He was received by Mr. Geo. H. Broadhead, who introduced him, saying:

It is my pleasure and duty in behalf of the members of the Stock Exchange to tender to you our best wishes for your happiness and prosperity, and the happiness and prosperity of the people over whom you are the worthy ruler.

The latter part of the speech was lost in the beginning of the racket. Hats flew right and left, and howls of the most dismal sort rang out from several hundred men, who were each trying to outdo the other in unmanly performances. The King looked on in blank wonder; several of the brokers nearest the desk shook their fists in the royal face, and yelled out strings of curses and imprecations in bewildering rapidity. The King drew back a safe distance, and looked beseechingly toward the door. Not a word could be heard, but by motion it was intimated to him that the exhibition was over, and guarded by the combined force of porters, floor guards and officers of the Exchange, he was hustled along to the door on Wall street. The brokers made several passes at the hats of members of the royal party, but on collecting themselves together in the carriage, after a struggle through the outside mob, the King and party found that they were still entire. A long explanation from Alderman Van Schaick, who had been a sort of leader on the floor, only served to still more mystify the royal seeker of information, and at last he gave it up in the single remark that, so far as he could understand, it was "an imitation of a bull-fight and a bear garden combined."

During the King's visit, however, the assemblage was comparatively quiet and orderly to what it had been during the earlier hours of the day. His Majesty was to have been at the Exchange, according to programme, shortly after 12 o'clock. It was generally known that the royal personage was a big fellow and of dark complexion. An unfortunate waiter from a neighboring restaurant happened to enter one of the ante-rooms at about the hour named. He answered the royal conditions exactly; he was large, and he was a deep brunette—that was sufficient for the uproarious brokers. He was at once seized, and, proceeded by a band of half a dozen tiny piges playing an accompaniment to a chorus of yells from an hundred throats, the unfortunate darkey was marched into the court of the Exchange. With the closest of physical attentions he was hustled up to the presiding officer's rostrum. That official refused to recognize his pseudo majesty. But, nothing daunted, the vigorous stock speculators passed him rapidly and somewhat unceremoniously about the hall several times, at last landing him on the table in the centre. He stood up and attempted to explain that he had no relations to royalty. His words lost themselves in the mouth of a horn several feet in length, which was thrust into his face and blown with deafening effect by a pair of stentorian lungs. A sudden motion of the table caused the elevated object of such multifarious attention to sit suddenly down. A poor, little, unoffending broker, who had been jostled to the front by his more lusty brethren, received the full weight of the fall, and one broker was sent home hors de combat. The butt of all this fun at last escaped a good portion of his wearing apparel had been left in shreds on the floor.

N. Y. World's Washington Letter.

Ben Butler's Cheap Transportation.

Facing the south front of the Capitol, on New Jersey avenue, a dwelling house of solid granite is building. Its position and structure are remarkable enough, even were it not the property and design of General Butler. It is a copy, 1:10 scale, of his Lowell house. The stones from Cape Ann quarries, and he got it here in a characteristic way, according to report. When the pedestal for the Scott monument was shipped to Washington, Butler said he would give the ballast if allowed to select it. He was, and accordingly ballasted the ship with his granite, and thus practically solved the question of cheap transportation. Before his gubernatorial campaign in '73, which was the finest field he ever had for a display of his peculiar humor, a gentleman told him authoritatively that if he would keep quiet then and wait till the next year he could be Governor of Massachusetts without any fuss.

"My friend," said Butler promptly, "I am much obliged to you, but I don't want anything I can get without a fuss."

A Tragic Story.

In the French papers there is a tragic history of a magpie. It was a greater favorite of the butcher who owned it; but a boy who had "received notice" and was to leave in short time, taught the bird to say, "It's my neck." These provoking words it pronounced whenever the butcher showed to his customers his prettiest cuts, and the juvenile lads thus compelled that butcher to murder his favorite.

A Maine man boasts that he has made the best rifle shot ever heard of. He recently fired at a dog in the night being directed only by his bark, and hit him in the throat.
