THE SOUTHERNER.

On the slope of one of the beautiful Swiss mountains stood a large cottage, so shut in by the lofty peaks SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO which towered round it, that its inhabitants could hardly eatch a glimpse of the blue sky. It was the dwellingplace of a young couple and their only child, a little boy of four years old; and poor and lonely though it was, yet it was the abode of peace and love; and no king was happier than Franz, when on his return from hunting, or else from a day's work at one of the farms in the sheltered valley at the foot of the mountain, he met his Gutchen and the little Wilhelm hastening along the mountain-path to meet and welcome him, as soon as they heard the distant sound of his voice singing some lively hunting-song. One beautiful morning, Franz said to his wife, "I must go up the mountain to-day. The sun is shining bright and warm, and there is a good chance of finding game; besides, who knows how soon the weather may change So, putting on his hunting-coat and pouch, and taking his gun in his hand, he bade good bye, in a cheerful voice. to his wife and child, and disappered up the mountain-side. His wife had no sooner lost sight of him, than she felt a strange sinking of the heart, as if she was never to see him again. She gazed out of the window on which there were many beautiful forms traced by the frost, but she tried in vain to overcome the fears which had taken possession of her mind, and she sat

For three days they worked incessantly without any success. All then lost courage except Franz, who never despaired, but continued to dig night and day, without speaking to his companions, but praying inwardly to God, who gave him strength to persevere in spite of his grief and anxiety. In the meantime, Gutchen believed herself shut up for ever in her subterranean prison. Their stock of provision could not last long, and then she and her little Williams, who often asked her when it would be morning, as by A GENTS FOR THE SALE OF OLD the light of the lump she read in her Bominion Nails, Emery's Cotton Gin, Bible of Christ's miracles, and found comfort in praying that he might save them, if it were possible; and if not, that he would soon take them to his
