FRIDAY JANUARY 9 1880

Poetry.

Among the Reeds.

THE DOKE TILTON.

Swim fast, O wounded swan, swim fast!

Thy mate awaits thee in her nest,

Not dreaming that the day was lost.

Which quivers in thy bleeding breast!

Swim fast, O dying swan, swim fast!

Die not till she beholds thy face,

For she may deem some fickle blast

Hath blown thee to another mate!

Swim fast, O faithful swan, swim fast!

The adverse tide is swift and strong;

Swim fast, swim fast, until at last

Thou sing to her thy dying song!

If you sit down at set of sun,

And count the days that you have done,

One self-denying act, one word

That eased the heart of him who heard,

One glance most kind,

That feel like sunshine where it went,

Then you may count that day well spent.

But if through all the lifelong day

You've cheered no heart by sea or way,

If through it all

You've nothing done that you can trace,

That brought the sunshine to our face,

No act most small,

That helped some soul, and nothing cost

Then count that day as worse than lost.

EDITH'S LOVER.

Coming out upon the terrace where

They stood alone together in the June twilight, I remember thinking what a handsome, noble-looking couple they made, and how well it was that my mistress had chosen Mr. Hollis for her future husband when so many attractive young gentlemen aspired to the honor of her hand.

As I approached, Mr. Hollis was saying:

"To-morrow is our wedding day,

Edith! To-morrow! I can scarcely realize it. Ah, how proud and glad I am!"

My lady looked at this moment, her cheeks all aglow, her eyes shining with happiness. Hearing my step she said in her gentle way:

"What is it, Jenny?"

"A strange woman has presented herself at the kitchen door, madam. She asked for you and will not be denied.

She does not live in these parts, I think;

her accent and dress are both peculiar.

Good gracious, there she comes now, and I left her on the kitchen step!"

My mistress looked in the direction indicated and beheld a drooping forlorn figure slowly advancing from the rear of the house.

lady's bell summoned me to her chamber.

I found her sitting with her wraps on and a bit of paper—the same the woman had given her—clenched in her hand.

Her face wore a sadder expression than I had ever seen upon it before.

"Jenny," she said, turning in her chair as I entered, "do you know a place in the village called Holme's

Cottage?"

"Yes, madam."

"Good. Get your bonnet; I wish you to take me there. I wish to set out at once."

"But it is a long distance, madam;

if you must go, shall I not order the carriage?"

"I do not wish this visit known to any one else in the house, Jenny. The servants would think strange of it.

You, I am sure, are discreet and faithful."

We left the house by a side door, locking it and taking the key with us.

Presently we reached Holme's Cottage. It was a long low building in the out skirts of the village, at some distance from any other dwelling. Since my knowledge of the house began it had been occupied by the poor class of tenants.

"Some one I wish to see is here," she said quietly. "Remain outside, Jenny. I shall not be long away."

She entered without knocking and closed the door. The next instant I heard a glad cry within, then a burst of sobs.

Suddenly Mr. Hollis confronted me, his face white and convulsed in the moonlight!

"Tell me," he said in a husky whisper

"was it Edith, my promised wife, that went in at yonder door?"

I could not speak, but my looks answered him.

He dropped my hand and turned away, when a few agitated words came through the open window:

"Edith, I knew you would come!

my precious darling, my wife! You were not so cruel as to forsake me utterly."

It was a man's voice, but Mr. Hollis seemed to hear a simple word only of those it uttered.

"Wife!" he echoed, in a hollow tone.

"Wife! Good God! And to-morrow was to have been our wedding day!"

In spite of my terror and bewilderment, I had the presence of mind to grasp his arm and drag him further away from that house.

"What brings you here?" I sternly demand. "Why have you followed me?"

"I did not follow you; I am no spy;

it was chance that brought me in this direction to-night. Nay, not chance," he added, with sudden vehemence, "but the providence of God!"

"Then before I could say a word in reply, he had freed himself from my grasp and was striding down the shallow-haunted street.

Ten minutes later my mistress came out. She drew a deep breath as she clasped my arm, and I felt her tremble.

"Come, Jenny, let us get away from here quickly. I shall be glad to reach home again—so glad."

She looked so miserable and dispirited that I had not the courage to tell her what had occurred outside the cottage while she lingered within.

Next morning while she was at breakfast, and the mystical stir of the bridal preparations was going on in the house, one of the servant brought in a large package. She cut the cords and out fell a heap of letters—the pure, dainty letters she had written from time to time to her lover—and the books and keepsakes she had given him.

I saw her stagger turn pale and catch her breath. Then she looked at me with a bewildered air.

"I—I—don't understand. Do you Jenny?"

The package and a brief note it contained were Deane Hollis's farewell.

My lady did not cry or faint. Flinging my note away, she clasped both hands to her forehead.

"My God! This is incomprehensible. What—what—does he mean?"

"I can tell you, madam," And I did.

When she learned that Mr. Hollis had been at Holme's Cottage the night before, and what he had overheard there, instead of sinking to the floor in shame and confusion, as I half expected, she sprang towards the door and with a smothered sob of joy.

"Oh heaven! she said. Come Jenny, we have another mission to perform."

"Where are you going?" I said, looking at her wonderingly.

"Come and see. Heaven grant that we be not too late."
