CHAPTER XI.

The ficrce Asiatic had called into play his daggerlike knife.

If the language of Mr. Folsom Simpson in addressing Martha may seem sary, it must be remembered that it was ing secrets which the detective was hopeful of securing from her. Any young woman might be pardoned for shrinking from entering the spacious yard, with its gloomy shadows, after having learned that a murderous miscreant was crouching among the dense shadows. The knowledge would have some egrand and will not be gone long. | made the bravest man nervous, especially when unarmed, and it required all of the officer's powers of persuasion to induce the woman to approach the building.

Directly behind the stranger and only few paces distant loomed the figure of Martha, walking at the same pace, so as not to fall farther to the rear. It was evident that, though he was unknown to her, she was making use of his presence as a shield against that shadowy peril of which she had received warning.

"If that man turns into the yard, what will she think? She will fancy that he is the thug himself, but she sees now that he is not."

The individual who just then was an object of so much interest passed the gate, speedily vanishing in the darkness beyond, while Martha, after a moment's hesitation, turned into the yard and came forward between the trees along the walk to the front door. The lamp threw enough of its rays in the direction of the house for a spectator

So she advanced serenely and doubtless would have

The woman consumed precious little time in letting herself in the front door. Now, have confidence in me, Martha, and Any one seeking admission at such an hour into his own home, when he fancies some awful horror is stealing upon him ings during the few seconds she was engaged in unlocking the entrance. She whisked inside, however, without

The doctor remained in the background, as if occupied with some other natter. The face of the young lady being in shadow, he could not see the expression of her features, though he believed she was silently gazing into the gloom and meditating over the strange occurrences of the last few days.

"She must have heard the opening and closing of the front door, and Martha will lose no time in telling her story"—
Miss Gilder suddenly turned her head. Then she hastily drew down the curtain, so that the interior of the room was shut out from any prying eyes, no matter where located.

It was easy to read the meaning of what he saw. The returning servant had knocked on the door and was bidde. to enter, Miss Gilder looking around as she did so. The moment she gained the chance she uttered something which gave warning of what was coming. The young lady whipped down the curtain, and she and Dr. Maidhoff were at that moment listening to the startling

The situation was most peculiar. Simpson had set out to learn something about the rajah's ruby, whose secret he was confident was fully known to the couple, but he found himself unexpectin a twinkling, and then there is not the edly checked when on the very threshold by the presence of Wichman, engaged on similar business, though hardy with the purpose he himself had in

The question he asked himself was what the couple within the house were the purpose of keeping his part of the agreement with the young woman, who lit was to be supposed that the physician was armed, and he would hardly leave Miss Gilder and the servant alone after the revelation of the latter.

Martha's description of the individual that had warned her might throw some discredit on his words, for her listeners would not fail to identify him as the clared to be the detective that he really was. Simpson was inclined at the moment of leaving the servant to ask her to conceal his identity, but such a request she would have been quite sure to forget in her excitement, and it would cause distrust of his good faith.

But for the presence of that dusky sepoy Simpson might have ventured upon a stealthy entrance into the dwelling in the hope of picking up some information. A risky thing to do at any time-for it was a penitentiary offenseprowling among the shadows.

Simpson had maneuvered and moved about a good deal among the trees, and We'll do it Nicely while doing so was fortunate enough to discover his rival and enemy.
