THE New York Sun in speaking of George Ransom's sugar speculation says :

There is no similarity between the McPherson family's investments in sugar and the investment of the Ransom family It surprises us to see that the two cases are by some minds confounded.

Senator Ransom's son George went into a bucket shop and bet $10 that sugar would go up. The young man apparently had no other motive than th impulse to be real devilish. He certainly was not gambling with the idea of achiev ing a fortune at a single stroke. He did not consult his father. The Senator knew nothing about George's little flyer until a few days ago. George had no tip from his father, it is absurd to suppose cough.

that if inside information had been lying around loose in the Ransom establishment, George would have been playing sugar for my ten dollar limit. The size of the transaction is the strongest possible guarautee against scandal, as affecting the Senator. There is absolutely nothing in the affair to show that the North Caroli na Senator ever had the remotest idea of indulging in stock speculation of any sort, much less of turning to private ad vantage the opportunities of his official post.

That George should be caught visiting a bucket shop and risking $10 of hisown hard carned money, is a matter of purely personal concern to Senator Rans an; it affects him in no way officially. It is one of the incidents of paternity,
