A MODEL BOY.

Master Roney Collins, Whose First Thought Was Ever of His Mother.

Col. John F. Fruton, president of the First National Bank of Wilson, pays the following tribute to the memory of Master Roney Collins, whose first thought was ever of his mother: Roney Collins is dead, and in his death I lost an unselfish and valued friend. And you ask wherein was he a valued friend? In this-we met each other on the street and almost daily, he bearing his responsibilities and I conscious of mine. He did not forget to howdy with me, tip his cap and favor me with a smile; this last a generous expression of good will and friendship, In the evenings when 1 had closed my office and started home I frequently found him "on his job" delivering papers, and sometimes for ever so short a distance he would favor me with his company, we talked business, his own. Then his his spirit of enthusiasm was contagious. His answers to questions were thoughtful and never extravagant. This impressed me and I studied him the more. I found he was methodical, honest with himself: he did not loaf-only once. A game of football was on and one side was short of players: he stopped just a few short minutes and helped the weaker side in a rush which landed the ball. Had he not done this I would have lost interest in him. I recall now his happy laugh as he gathered up his papers and hastened their delivery in better time than if he had not stopped.

Had he lived 1 should never have told that I subjected him to severe scrutiny and study, but being anxious to know the secret of manliness as manifested in his steadiness and persistence of effort. I did seek diligently without favor or partiality. He told me one day, not in words, but in the tender expression of his eyes and voice as he made reference to his mother, He was devoted to her, and she was his partner, The tenderness of his feelings for her was as refined as pure

"THE BEST DRINK."

On a pleasant day in the early Fall A stranger rode into the town, And, stopping his horse in the public square,

Glanced this way and that with a frown, For the place that he sought he could not find (Drinkshops had been closed that year).

So he called to a lad when assed that way, And said to him, "Laddie, come here.

"Here's a copper for you to show the way

To the best drinking-place you know." "All right,"-he answered-a quick-witted youth-"Just turn that street, sir, and go

Till you come to another, turn right again, And you'll see it quite plainly," said John.

So thanking the lad, the stranger rode on,

And John, with a hop, skip and jump, After the stranger he went in a trice,

Brought up at the old town pump.

"Here you are sir," said John with a good-natured smile; "It's the best drinking-place to be found,

Take a drink, sir; it's free, and you're welcome, I'm sure. And it's good for your health, I'll be bound !"

The man took the joke in a good-natured way,

And drank of the water so clear,

Then said, "'Tis an excellent drink, I am sure: As good as I've had for a year."

So saying he tossed the bright lad a new coin, "The lesson is worth that to me,

And if you keep playing your temperance joke 'Twill make the world better," said he

Not only the Christian religion and the strength of the State are anchored in this principle, but there is no other key for the home. If the husband is an absolute monarch, his wife and children become vassals and slaves. If the wife is a stubborn shrew, the husband grows careless, despondent and useless.
