Col. Waddell at Wilson.

The Raleigh Observer, which publishes a very interesting account of the Commencement Exercises at Wilson, has this trator of the theft. While he was out to say of Hon. A. M. Waddell and the walking he espied a negro, Larry Niel, with address delivered by him on that occasion: Col. Waddell is a genuine orator; the gift was born in him; of strikingly handsome appearance, of an ancient lineage, unexceptional manners and great ability. his future is in his own hands; always regarding him above the average of men I was not surprised at the applause his address elicited.

> I give below the best synopsis possible in the short time I have before the mail

The subject of the speech was "Two Americans-Morse and Maury." It opened with a graphic description of the scene in the Hall of the House of Representatives at Washington, Jan. 16, 1872, when the memorial services were beld in honor of Morse, and the telegraph instrubrought messages from all over the earth, thus making it a grand memorial meeting of the whole civilized world. Then followed a rapid review of the progress of learning from the earlest period, in which the in the invention of the telegraph. The leading facts of Morse's history were given; the manner, time and place of the invention-his struggle through poverty and heaped upon him by every civilized country, and the humble christian spirit which Report of City Treasurer for the months always actuated him. A striking discuson civilzation, and a picture of the future, closed this part of the discussion. Then he took up Maury, described the contrast between his quiet death and burial in Virginia, in the same cemetery with Stonewall Jackson and Lee. and the pomp and ceremony of Morse's memorial services He said that he was proscribed, and couldn't hold the humblest office, but-and then followed such a glowing tribute to his character and services, such a picture of how the winds and sea would perpetuate his name, when a burst of applause testified to their ed, and his invaluable services were deeign governments were set forth, his visit to Europe and his work there was detailed; his return to America, and his last efforts in behalf of the agricultural interests of the country were portrayed, and then followed another splendid tribute to him, superior even to the first. Finally as shown by the report of the retiring closed his speech with a brilliant poetic figure, descriptive of the spirit of Morse, fire, descending to crown Maury's genius. We cannot blame Col. Waddell for declining our offer to publish the spech, because he will doubtless deliver it at other places. He certainly ought to, for it will delight any intelligent audience and will add greatly to his reputation. .
