The Ford Combination.

Julius Cæsar.

Our people owe Mr. Ford many thanks for the very excellent dramatic combination with which he was enabled to render for their enjoyment last evening the great play of Julius Carar. The appreciation of the community was evidenced in a crowded house, an audience at once fashionable, intelligent and critical. To present such a play properly requires at least four actors of equal ability to sustain the leading roles of Cassins, Antony, Brutus and Casar-as mere traveling stock com- Court in the sum of $100, in default of bination will suffice While the character which defendant was assigned quarters at shown its sousie face in this Wood is retailing at three dollars per of Marc Antony demands great dramatic the hotel de Howard. power in the only two scenes of importa ce in which he appears, that of Cassius is unquestionably the great leading character of the play.

M . Pangs as Marc Anthony bore himcelf most magnificently in the scene over rear's warm and bleeding carcass when he lies surrounded by the noble executioners at the foot of Pompey's statue. And in that most remarkable oration from the pulpit he exceeded our happiest expectations. In the minor scenes there was a spice of too much affectation in his manner.

Mr. Keene's Cassius, however, in our opinion, was the finest display of dramatic talent exhibited during the evening. His conception of the character was of the highest order, and in portraying the able, cunning, far-seeing statesman that Cassius was, in spite of his passionate abandonment at times, he assumed a sway over the audience from the start and held it unbroken to the close, Nothing could be more admirably en-He who gives alms makes the very best acted than that scene in the first act where he endeavor to induce Brutus to join the conspiracy.

Mr. Downing showed us a Brutus of fine physical proportions and rich, deep voice. He looked the character very handsomely but dil not win upon us at first, being rather too stolid and philosophic for even Brutus. He grew upon us, however, and in the quarrel with Cassius bore himself admirably-in scene. Had he at first displayed more emotion in the many magnificent expressions of Brutus and used more aminated gestures our pleasure would have been

It was altogether an evening of rare enjoyment and an experience we would be gratified to repeat at an early day. The whole Company seems to have been select- ducted by P. P. Samuel Hanstein, assisted ed and brought together with care and for fitness and adaptability to the parts assigned them.

The Fatal Pistol.

An old citizen who read the report of the fatal duel in ye olden time between Col. Sam' Swann and Mr. Bradley, as published by us yesterday, says that he hav seen the pistol from which the fatal shot was fired. It was a brass-barreled, smooth-bore duelling pistol. It was about sixty years ago that he saw it, when he was a boy, and the pistol was at that time in the possession of Mr. David Smith, uncle to Col. Wm. L. Street Talk This Morning.

The question in everybody's mouth this morning: "Did you go to the theatre, last night? Wasn't it splendid, grand and maguificent? How did you like Caius Cassius?" "Ah, it couldn't have been bettered!' "How did you like Marc Antony?" "Well, ah-he was-well, pass that over." "How did you like Brutus?" "Good: it was all good. Good morning," and off the colloquists start in opposite directions, one trying to carry with him the bearing of Cassius, and the other try ing to imagine himself like Brutus.

. A Good Time.

Last night about 9 o'clock several members of the St. George and St. Andrews Society, with a few other invited guests, among them Captain Buchan, of the barque North Carolina, assembled in one of the rooms on the second floor of the MacRae building and were handsomely entertained by Messrs. W. Roddick and R. G. Ross, who had provided for the occasian as good an imitation as possible of old English reast beef, and a haggess -a real Scotch baggess-two of them in fact (mark how we avoid the pitral) Never before has a baggess city. At least there is no record of such an event. Those who feasted last night can have but one regret, viz: that they did not long ago make the acquaintance of this "chieftain of the pudding race." A very pleasant time the guests had. There was a world of good cheer, there were pleasant stories, good songs, by some of Wilmington's best singers, toasts and speeches. One feature of the evening must not be omitted; the Delter. were asked to give a name to the hall on the third floor, and with one consent, out of compliment to Her Gracions Majesty, they named it for her sum mer residence in Scotland, "Bal-

At a reasonable hour, out of considera-Syne" was sung and the party dispersed, well satisfied in every particular.
