The Queen Among Her Soldiers.

Much has been said in England in complaint of the widowed Queen's continued absence from scenes of mere pageantry and festivity. This is considered a fault in royalty; but her sub sets can pardon their sovereign a 'fault' of the feelings as long as she shows herself at home in scenes of suffering and pity. Her visit to Netley hospital, not far from Osborne, her summer island home, is thus decaribed in a London letter to the New York Times:

She went through all the wards, and said some kindly words to the men. The Princess Beatrice was with her. A friend who was of the visiting company tells me that there were tears more than once in the queen's eyes as she spoke to the more seriously maimed of the troops.

While her majesty was inspecting the wards, an interesting gathering was assembling outside for one of those ceremonies which so effectually bind the soldier to the throne. Those hospital patients who were well enough to be paraded turned out in their serge dresses, forming on three sides of a square, with the army service corps and the army hospital corps. and awaited the Queen, standing at

He looked the picture of a brave, strong man; one arm, desperately wounded, rested in a sting, but the young fellow stepped out, with and easy clastic trend. He was signalled to go to the Queen, who was standing on the ho-pital steps. Her mejesty 8:coped towards him and pinned upon the breast of his serge coat the Victoria cross. As he stood there evidently much moved—the Q teen also agitated you might have neard a pin drop smong the lookerson, the stillness, however, being succeeded by a loud and hearty cheer.

Speaking e'ymologically as P. L. B. loes, Good Housekeepers are always of the feminine gender, singular number and second person, agreeing in all things with their Husbands, except as to housekeeping, and making him attend to his own business when he dares offer advice about that. A man who is his own housekeepes is a fool, L. P. B says. He who carrie his own pantry keys, opens a door to the devil, L. P. B. says. He is fit only for shavings and whitewash, L. P. B. says L. P.
