The Christmas Tree.

Furns, that wayward child of genius in his exquisite poem, the" Cotter's Satur, day Night' has beautifully portrayed one of the customs of the Scottish peasantry in the olden on e. It is, as every one knows, a most touching discription of a home sce: e so vividiy painted and so naturally drawn that the characters stand out from the canvass distinct in their individual reality. There are few poems in our I nguage, few indeed in any language so rich in description and so full of tender pathos and genuine poetry, a poetry that appeals directly to th heart and to the affections. It was a beautiful custom at the time when Burns wrote, and we sincerely trust that the progressive spirit of the age has not interfered with it, for the influences of such customs are too sacred to be ignored or lorgo'ten. Something akin to that custom, though of a less devout character, we have with us in this joyous season of the year, when the Christmas tree is planted in our homes, when triends and kindred gather around it with grateful hearts to the giver of all good for his bountiful mercies, and tokens of kind remembrance are passed from hand to hand and words of lo . from every lip. It was our privilege on Christmas night with other friends to join the circle ar , id a Christmas tree. I was a beautiful sight and beautiful for its s mplici y for there was no tinsel glare and show, no attempt at display, no straining after effects, but the combined influence of good aste, delicacy and refinement, were every where apparent and gave a beauty and a charm to the scene that ner ellously pleasant. Around were gathered the family and the kinsfolk and the friends, old age with tottering steps, manhood it its pride, and youth and beauty, and joy N. C. ous childhood with its merry laugh. He who can it ten to the laughter of a child with at a quekening pulse and kindling emotion is worse toan film who "has no music in hi aselt," for there is nothing on this broad earth so indicative of unalloyed happiness as the laugh of a young child. There were none around that tree who did not feel the happy influence excited by those natic hindering things, who, with the cares and troubles that they bring, yet flood with subshine every heart and home wherein they ledge. Catching the centa venerable head white with the frosts of many winters, forgot for the time the intirmit sof age and was again a boy, the post some y in croadall aside her dignity and moved around with all the exuberence of youth, and vigorous manhood shouted back in boyish glee to tottering infancy in iones of una loyed deli bt.

I was a happy occasion, and long may this custom be abserved among us. Ou every Caristinas let us plant our tree, st e home after of the affectous, ert and han more in unison, at a each other ha py and n.o

a so up observances like these and some all was over, and the figure pat out, there mingled with the parting words good night, the prayer of Tiny Tim, 'God bless ou Oh s mas time and bless us every ond.
