

A GOOD-NIGHT.

By-and-by the evening falls,
Sons of labor rest,
Sons of labor seek the stalls,
Wentry cattle seek the stalls,
Hinds are in the nest,
By-and-by the tide will turn,
Change ome's o'er the sky,
Lies' hand lass the child will learn,
By-and-by.

For the Review.
Officers We Have Seen.
My DEAR REVIEW:
In order that we may draw a truthful picture of some officers we have seen it is absolutely necessary to have witnessed that mummified farce, "Bonaventura Furiosa" in the good old Hibernian times, in the days when men were honest and did not dabble in musters and medals and did not pass current in the land, as the tale goes a certain man was elected corporal and when he reached home he "majestic stride" and "turkey gobble strut" could only have been emulated by Roscoe of the hypion curls! seeing him assume such gigantic proportions his good wife desired to know if his children must still associate with the neighbors' children, &c., &c.; and that she was anxious to find out what was she now. Now, don't you know that it was a bomb in her camp, when the corporal informed her that she was the same old fool she always was? Now, Plato and Diogenes may have known something of that special philosophy to which their lives were devoted and their discourses may have dissected the special subject before them; Cicero and Demosthenes, whose divine eloquence could admiring angels to lead over the balustrades of heaven in bewilderment and wonder, may have thrilled the Roman and the Grecian bosom." Homer, Horace, Virgil, Ovid, Euripides and a host of others who bended suppliant knees to the tuncful nine, may have understood something of the "ars poetica" but fate, stern arbiter of human destiny, let loose a decree—like the hosts turned loose from the caverns of the wind—that said, all of the excellencies of philosophy, oratory and polite literature should be embodied in "some office holder we have seen." See their consequential swagger; see the shake they give their Boetian heads; and, ye gods, and little fishes! stand from under, A god has been hurled from Olympian heights, and consents to lend this subsidiary sphere his mighty presence for a time. In a crowd his stentorian voice is heard like the rumble of distant thunder and he looks with ineffable scorn down upon the individual who has the temerity to gainsay or deny one of his propositions. What was the use of the Ecumenical Council? Why call the mighty prelates to Rome? It is all about the infallibility of the Pope. The only infallible being upon whose head the sun ever shone upon whose head the sun will ever shine, is "some officeholder we have seen."

Now, some folks, notwithstanding all that they assume, might picture them as the corporal did his wife, but then, of course, dear Review, we know that they are entitled to as much consideration as the Autocrat of all the Russias. But, there, I must stop, this moralizing. I took up my pen to say to you that Pender is ablaze with prohibitory enthusiasm. It is really surprising to see how our ranks are being filled up; new converts daily, year, hourly, are enrolling their names and swearing eternal fealty to this righteous cause whose chief aim is for the protection of the poor inebriate and to send sunshine upon the hearts of the neglected wife and child. Pender has donned her armor, has buckled on her trusty blade, and promises to bend her proud plume to no county in the good old North State in this great, grand and glorious warfare against King Alcohol.
