Just look at the dear little laughing face-At the rosebud mouth, at the violet eyes-Why the photograph-taker, that vanity shaker, Will think this time we have brought him a prize!

We carried our child to the town one day, The skies were soft and the air was cool, We robed him richly in fine array-Ribbons and laces, and Swiss and tulle; He looked like a prince in the artist's chair, Sitting erect, and brave and grand, With a big red apple he scarce could grapple. The train, which was coming north, was boarded at Wilmington, N. C., by a large number of bright-looking colored men, who were delegates to a convention to be held at Raleigh. One of these delegates, falling into conversation with his white fellow-traveler, told him the story of his life, and appealed to him for aid in was devoted.

The negro, who was a genuine, coalforty-five years of age. His name is E. F. Martin. He said that he was born a slave, and was owned by the great Georgia rebel, Vance. When the war broke out he accompanied his master to the field as his body servant. When they left the plantation Mrs. Vance said to him: "Bring back your master, dead or alive. If he is killed let him be buried here." The slave promised, and master and man rode away together. On the eve of a certain battle the slave said: "Massa, you must not lead your troops to-morrow." "Why not?" was the sharp reply.

The negro would not tell unless his master would promise not to tell where he learned what the slave would reveal. The master would not promise, and the slave, though threatened with a flogging, refused to do more than repeat his warning. The morrow came, the battle was fought, and the master was shot in the back by his own troops. His body was taken home by the slave, and the sorrowing widow said: "Go and work for yourself until the war is over. The plantation is ruined, and we cannot keep you here."

The negro accordingly went to Atlanta, where he worked on the Confederate fortifications, taking there the name of E. F. Martin. He then tramped northward, worked through the Union lines, and was engaged at Sherman's head-quarters as a guide. Martin helped to guide the army toward Atlanta, where his knowledge of the fortifications was of great value to Sherman. After the
