There are nine hundred thousand spindles in the cotton mills of Lowell in 1883 against less than six hundred thousand in 1873. The capacity of the paper mills of Hollyoke and the woolen mills of Maine and New Hampshire has increased about the same ratio. Hence water powers that were sufficient ten years ago are inadequate to day. Electric motors will solve that difficulty in less than a decade.

The Boston Commercial Bulletin puts the case in a nutshell thus: "Parties may honestly differ as to the degrees of protection desirable at any given time on a given article, but it is safe to predict that no party will commit the blunder of advocating free trade or protection for itself alone. Both are expedients. The folly of him who advocates free trade as an economic "principle"-as anything more than a means own sake."
