By the terms of the cartel they were to stand eight paces apart and com mence firing at a given signal, and to advance and fire until the pistols were emptied, unless one or both fell. The arms to be used were Colt's revolvers, fearful weapons when in the hands of skillful and determined men. Eight paces! Colt's revolvers! Who expected that either would be able to continue the fight after the first fire? We did not, but we were mistaken. Neither was hit at the first shot, a fact which entitles them to a chromo for being the poorest marksmen in the country.

We do not believe that a resort to the code duello is the proper way to settle a difficulty, however grave may be the provocation. On the contrary, we be lieve it to be morally, as we know it is legally, wrong to send a challenge, accept a challenge or carry a challenge to mortal combat, but when men get to such a pitch as these two editors did, that they would make the world think they must have blood or burst-that they consider the affront so great that they dare defy all the laws of God and man in order to wipe out the stain-then something ought to be done.

At the second fire, we are told, Mr. Elam was wounded in the thigh when Mr. Bierne declared himself satisfied, saluted his fallen foe by raising his hat, and walked off the field. We presume that Mr. Elam was also satisfied, although the report is silent as to his sentiments in the matter. Fortunately minister is wanted for about three hun. a surgeon was at hand to attend to such accidents, and the wounded man was Now, how much better off is Mr. Bierne in his own or in the world's estimation? Mr. Elam is certainly no better off. He called the former very ugly and opprobrious names and got a bullet in the thigh in consequence. The honors are easy so far as he is concerned. But such is not the case with Mr. Bierne. The offensive epithets and charges which caused all this trouble have never been retracted, yet he is satis fied. He may claim that they were wiped out in the blood of his antagonist, but that must be a poor consolation to a serious mourner, so long as those charges remain unretracted. The incidents of the duel only go to show (if they show anything but criminal folly) that Mr. Elam made the charges and had the pluck to stand by them, even at the risk of his life.
