Again he started with muleteers aud servants on the difficult and perilous journey over the Cordilleras, and then crossed the Pampas to Buenos Ayres and Rio de Janeiro. In April, 1854, there lay in the harbor of Rio a yessel hailing from Liverpool called the Bella, about to sail to Kingston, Jamaica, on her way to New nearly 500 tons burden, clipper built and almost new. Tichborne wanted to go to Kingston, where his remittances from England had been forwarded, beas a young English gentleman in half Republican party, therefore, nautical costume, pea jacket, round hat pearance of a man who had traveled Burkett, of the Bella, decided to take him along. At that time there was ing conditions. great excitement in Brazil about runaway slaves, and no yessel was. allowed to sail with a stranger on board withtaken for a half-breed, and the Captain underwent some risk in taking him. He was stowed away in what is called the "Lazarette," and so escaped the eyes of the Government officials. The Bella sailed April 20, 1854, passing the narrow outlet from the grand harbor of Rio and spreading all her sails on her voyage northward. Six days alterward a yessel traversing her path found tokens of a wreck, straw bedding, a water cask and a long boat bearing the words "Bella, Liverpool." there had been nothing of a storm. She races. was never heard from again, and it is supposed that her cargo of coffee had shifted and that she had gone down in Physical Debility, Genital Weakness and all deep water, though the crew might easily have escaped in a boat. Tichborne's letters to England stopped, and his allowance of $5,000 a year was paid to Glyn & Co. But no draft on it was ever presented at their counters. The insurance on the Bella was paid to the owners, and in time she faded away into the great shadowy fleet of ships that
