In June, 1812, Napoleon's armies, comprised more than 1 150,000 men. He led nearly 500,000 across the Niemen. How many returned? It is conceded by military critics that the campaign was feebly managed. Napoleon's mind seems to have been constantly been almost incapable of coming to a were not vices of Napoleon's earlier

The next day after the battle of Smolensk a battle was fought at Valutino, a village three miles from Smolensk. It was a battle of such importance that it left 10,000 French troops on the field dead and wounded. The circumstances were such that it was and color, Napoleon's duty to be on the field. Yet, though he listened from dawn of day to the roar of artillery, and though he could have galloped to the field in thirty minutes, this greatest of military leaders stayed away. This is surely queer conduct in the general of an inyading army

Napoleon refused and even failed to go himself and inspect the field. Kutusoff soon recovered and the opportunity was soon recovered and the opportunity was lost. Again at 3 p. m. the same marshals jointly reported a like advantage, asked immediate reinforcements, and and finally consented to send reinforcements, but was so slow, whether purposely or not, that again the opportuni-ty was lost. What was the consequence? Borodino was a drawn battle. I'rue. Napoleon gained a technical victory in the fact that Kutusoff resumed his march. But a technical victory, especially to an invading army, is a sorry thing. The carnage on both sides was awful. At least 80,000 men lay upon the field. Napoleon's admirers apologized for his admitted feeble management on that day by saying that he was sick. He was not sick. He had a bad cold, but no man, merchant, lawyer, farmer or mechanic, stops work or calls himself sick for a bad cold. The Emperor was up and commanding the army ail day. About 4 p m. he rode over to his left centre, a distance of some three miles, to reconnoitre a position. The statement that he was sick is an afterthought. After he occupied Moscow his behavior showed pusillanimity.
