He went to the door, but saw nor heard auything unusual. He was then told that an unseen hand had thrown a pillow from the bed, before his arrival, and had extinguished the light, which was in a chair in the main hall. He was inclined to laugh at the matter and sat down upon the side of the bed and was pulling off his shoes when he was stricken in the side by an unseen hand, the room at the time being well lighted. This was a surprise to him, but feeling that it would be better to pay no attention to the matter, he put on a cool demeanor and asked Martha if she thought she could see her mother, when the latter replied that she could both see and hear her distinctly. To this Mr. Peadrick replied that it was more than he could do and told the young lady that it was nothing but an unduly excited imagination. He had barely expressed himself, however, when a pillow was thrown from the bed by an

Mr. Peadrick also claimed that he could see and hear his grandmother, and singularly enough these two who had seen the apparition had not the least particle of fear, while nearly all the other members of the household were in a state of intense nervous alarm. Of course sleep was driven from the eyes of the entire family for the night, and invisible hands threw the pillows from the bed at intervals until midnight, at which time a sound was heard resembling a kiss, when Martha stated that

On Saturday night the bed was moved early into the main hall and no disturbance was created during the night. On Sunday night the bed was kept in its proper place in the bed room and as soon as the young lady entered the room, at a little after 8 o'clock, the usual disturbance began. Some of the neighbors, arcused by curiosity and at the request of Mr. Peadaick and his family, arrived at the house early on Sunday night with the hope that they might assist in ferreting out the mystery, but they soon became so much alarmed that they needed assistance, instead of being of any material help.
