VOL. XI.

There is some alarm expressed in the Government departments by record cierks over the rapid fading of the documents printed on the type-writer. For several years nearly all the records of the departments have been copied by type-writers. It has been discovered that the records are becoming indistinct, and those written when typewriters were first put in general use are now exceedingly difficult to read. The record clerks predict serious trouble unless it is averted by steps being taken to reproduce the faded records, and wri ing those of the future in thk more durable than the aniline inks used on type-writer ribbons.
