Care of the Convalescent.

It would be well for those who have the care of any one during the state of convalesence from severe ill- POMONA HILL NURSERIES. nes, writes 'Family Doctor." in Cassell's Magazine, to treat their patient as if he were a nervous and growing youth. The "eakened tissues of both nervous and muscular matter are undergoing repair, and this is analogous to growth. In the ordinary state of health a man does not require food to build up his frame, so to speak, but simply to re pair the waste that is constantly taking place in work, or even in thought. After sickness it is different. The appetite is something almost voracious, but it should be remembered that the slightest overindulgence is most dangerous. Little and often must be the rule as regards eating, and while the dishes are tempting and appetizing, they should be most nutritious and at the same time easy of digestion. Frequent changes should be made, too. The patient must be safeguarded from cold and damp, but this does not mean that he is to keep in. the house-quite the reverse; and the more hours spent out of doors in the sunshine, the more speedy and perfect will his return to health be: only he is to wear warm underclothing and warm but not heavy over-clothing as well. A patient during convalescence may sometimes be peevish and discontented. This is by no means a good sign, and every care should be taken to keep his mind contended and easy. Amusement greatly tends to hasten the A Fancy Lot of Fine coming of health. Next in importance to nutritious and well cooked food is sleep.
