Merrimon, trying to convince the country that erners, Democrats and "rebels," are capable of. In other words, we have shown that it is really a race question and not a question of party character or sectional civilization, but a question of white and black, wherever and whenever they coexist.

In his late speech on this topic Senator Ingalis dwelt on the military services of the negro as a reason why he should be treated in the South with deference. Do not the Republicans pretend that the object of the Civil War was the freeing of the slaves? Are not the members of the Grand Army the comrades in arms of those valiant colored men of whom Senator Ingalls spoke?

And yet what are the facts? The Grand Army posts in the Southern States are all torn up over the admission of colored veterans, not to get into the posts of the white soldiers; they only ask that their own colored societies be received as units in the Grand Army of the Republic, and the white soldiers almost unanimously antagonize this effort. The following is a special dispatch from Charleston, S. C., to the New York at this season. Do not continue in Tribune of last Saturday:

"The split in the Grand Army of the Republic in Louisiana will probably be followed by one in this department. The Grand Army posts in this State were attached to the Department of Georgia. Several posts, composed of colored men, have been organized recently, but the department convention at its last neeting adopted a resolution declaring that no new posts would be admitted to the department. There are five colored posts in the department at present.

The negro veterans had been knocking at the Grand Army gates for a long time, but remained on the outside until Captain Gray gave the word, with General Alger's consent. Since that time the colored troops have been recruiting earnestly; and there are already nine posts, with eight hundred and forty members. The white veterans Pearl st., New York. have seven posts—about 325 members in the departments. The white posts did not meet the movement with favor, claiming that it would place them under colored rule within a very short time. Last Monday called, and all the posts were represented. It was claimed that the colored posts, which were granted charters after January 1, were not entitled to vote. The discussion caused an adjournment until Tuesday night. The colored posts filed a protest at the first meeting, and had a letter from Adjutant General George H.
