A FATAL STEP.

BY H. S. L.

I'm not the sort of a man, you know.

Demanding change of air to soften.

Her dress I only set my foot on.

And half the room was in a titter,

(A fact which merely serves to make

I wonder why the women wear them ;

They seem designed, upon my word, For folks to tread upon and tear them.

She turned, and gave me such a glance ;

And raised my erring patent leather-Laid half the blame upon the crowd, And half upon the sultry weather.

I stayed an hour ; I talked a bit With guards and people from the city, My hearers, when I made a hit,

Were kind enough to think me witty.

There's joy at least, in that reflection;

The pangs that lay beneath my laughter-

They little knew, good easy men !

To sting the more forever after.

To dull the edge of recollection.

I might, perchance, in other climes,

Forget my sense of self-abhorrence,

Should peace return with better times, And clear again the way to Florence.

Remorse additionally bitter.)

Those trains are utterly absurd ;

Farewell, said I, my only chance

Her dress the sweetest ever put on ;

I set my hand upon her face-

Men and women were to be seen in all stages of intoxication, and some sottish fellows were observed lying in corners sleeping off the effects of their debauch .---One youth named Foulds, related to a person who keeps a hotel at New Brighton, managed to get some of the rum, drank it, and such were the consequences that, notwithstanding every medical attention, he succumbed to the fatal effects of the drink. A man employed as a painter emptied his paint can, wiped it out with a bunch of grass, filled it with rum, took a drink, fell on his head in a pool of water, and had it not been for some passers by would no doubt have lost his life; as it is, he is at present in a dangerous state from the effects of the rum.
