[From the Savannah News and Herald.] Duel Between Two Colored Men. A duel was fought yesterday at Screven's Ferry on the Carolina shore, between two colored men of this city, respectively named Jackson Brand and Eugene Morehead, which resulted in the death of the former.

The facts, as far as could be ascertained, are as follows: Jackson Brand was President of the Colored Conservative Club No. 1, and Eugene Morehead Vice President.

Brand was not long ago a violent Radical and a member of the Union League, but changed his politics and became an ardent supporter of the Conservative principles.

Among the members in the Conservative club of which he was President were a few who believed he was playing a double game; among them was Morehead, who kept a close watch upon him.

On Monday last Morehead observed Brand leaving the house of a noted Radical, and at once accused him of double dealing, and said among other things that he (Brand) had made a speech in the Loyal League, in which he had stated that it was his intention to wash his hands in the blood of every Southern man.

Brand denied the charge and a hot quarrel ensued, which, but for the interposition of friends, would have terminated in a fight on the spot.

They separated, and the next day (Tuesday) Brand sent a challenge to mortal combat to Morehead, Alex. Hardee, Secretary of the Conservative club, bearing the message. On handing the note to Morehead, Hardee was asked by him what it was all about. Hardee replied that it was a challenge to fight, and that Brand had sent it, whereupon Morehead, who is unable to read or write, asked Hardee to read it, which was done.

Morehead then asked Hardee to write an acceptance of the challenge, and state that he would choose double-barreled shot guns, loaded with sixteen buck shot, the distance sixteen paces, and the duel at Screven's Ferry the next morning at 7 o'clock.

The challenge was written, carried, agreed to, and every preparation made for the meeting on the "field of honor" the next morning.

Early yesterday morning found the parties on their way to the ground. Brand was accompanied by his second, Alex. Hardee, and Morehead by his, Haine Spearling. There were about a dozen friends along, but no surgeon. About a quarter past nine the preliminaries were arranged and the opponents placed opposite each other fifteen paces distant with double-barreled shot guns, one barrel of each being loaded with sixteen buckshot. Brand seemed somewhat nervous, while Morehead was perfectly cool and collected. At the command both simultaneously fired, and Brand fell, exclaiming "I'm not whipped yet," while at the same time was heard the exultant shout of Morehead, "By G-d I've got him," and afterwards he remarked that Brand seemed so "scared like" that he thought he would not kill him, but shoot him in the legs and give him time to repent of his treachery. Brand's second went to him as soon as he fell, and found that the charge from Morehead's gun had entered both thighs. Brand was quite weak from the loss of blood, and he could not stand up, but said if his second would hold him up he would exchange shots again. His second very properly refused to allow any further hostilities. Morehead then walked over to where Brand was lying, and shook hands with him. With the assistance of Morehead and the others, Brand was carried to the boat, and brought to the city.

and then placed in a vehicle and carried to his house, near the Atlantic and Gulf Railroad Depot. Drs. Bullock and Morrison were sent for, but the sufferer had been so long without medical aid, that their skill was unavailing, excepting to alleviate the pain, and he died at a quarter to twelve, two hours and a half after receiving the wound, which severed one, and probably both of the femoral arteries.

The deceased, who is about 35 years old, will be buried today. From parties who were present at the duel, we learn that everything was conducted properly, and that each of the duelists seemed determined to shoot the other, but the nervousness of Brand made him miss. Both parties were advised not to go, but would not heed the advice. Their neglect in not providing a surgeon was most criminal, and caused the death of Brand, who otherwise, would now, most probably be alive and out of danger. We understand that Morehead, upon being asked why surgeons had not been obtained, replied that he went to one, and he charged fifty dollars, and "I couldn't afford it; anyway, I didn't intend to be killed, and I thought the other fellow would have sense enough to bring one."
