The steamer carried no passengers, but the spy succeeded in getting aboard and went out to sea with the crew, leaving Wilmington harbor on the night of May 9, 1864. The vessel ran smoothly, with good winds and weather until late the following day, when an accident happened to the engine. The vessel sprang a leak and began to fill. The captain ordered the freight upon deck to be heaved overboard. It consisted of thirty bags of gold and 1,200 bales of cotton belonging to Kahnweiler Bros., consigned to a Nassau firm. When the money was brought on deck everybody filled his pockets full and the balance was thrown into the sea. Before the vessel was emptied of its freight the tederal steamer Massachusetts run the Greyhound down, and took the cotton

The young spy sobbed bitterly when she found that her plans had been foiled, She begged to be released and permitted to jump into the sea. Her hopes of carrying out the instructions of the President of the Confederacy were paramount to her existence, and when the one was hopelessly spoiled she wanted to blot out the other. Her captor, Lieut. S. W. Harding, held her a prisoner, and, bringing them to Boston, sold the cotton a

President Lincoln ordered all of the prisoners court-martialed and shot, but afterward, though the influence of Lieutenant Harding, commuted the punish-ment of Belle Boyd to banishment. She soon after crossed to London and created a great sensation when she married her captor, Lieut. Harding, who followed her over. They were married August 25, 1864. The lieutenant lived only a few months, and after a brief experience on the stage in England Belle Boyd returned to America on the steamship Africa, and, the war over, she settled in private life. She told the story of the capture of the Grevhound, which was to the effect that the engineer and crew found out that the fat bags contained gold, and they broke the Greyhound's engine in order to seize the gold, but the gold never did them any good. They were taken prisoners, and all of it which they had hidden in their pockets and on their persons was taken from them by the Federals. The owner

Daniel B. Kahnweiler, late of Kahnweiler Bros., cotton merchants of Wilmington, N. C., spent yesterday in Savannah, a guest of the Screven house, and he relates many incidents occurring in Wilmington, where Belle Boyd made her headquarters for a considerable time. Mr. Kahnweiler was personally acquainted with the famous woman. She was born in Martinsburg, W. Va., in 1846, and lived there until 1861. Her father was a merchant, her mother a handsome woman of good family,

As Martinsburg, Va., the place of her birth, was most of the time within the Union lines, Belle Boyd's secret service proved invaluable to the Southern commanders. Her first work as a spy was during a visit to the neighboring town of Winchester after war was declared. The dashing horsewoman heard of Federal movements which threatened her "beloved South," as she familiarly called it, and she gallantly rode by night to Stonewall Jackson's headquarters and told him what she knew. From that time she was attached to Jackson's brigade. She rode across the battlefield of Front Royal and carried Jackson dispatches which sent him in pursuit of Banks. She had already become the pet and pride of the Southern army.

She did so, but her success did not afford enough encouragement for her to continue an actress, and she gave it up.
