A Republican contemporary wants to know why some Democrat don't object to that $9,000,000 surplus in money and securities in the treasury of Texas. Well, one reason is that that surplus is not there to furnish a fund to boost jobs for the benefit of thrifty gentlemen who can manipulate votes, and another that a very large part of that surplus is in "securities."

Minneapolis wants the next National Republican Convention. By all means let Minne have it. The further away from the centre of civilization that crowd gets the better. The Republican Senators held Let it go to the wild, wild West, even r caucus yesterday on the Silver to the setting sun, or the jumping off place. They are going to prepare a grave yard for the g. o. p., and they can do it as well there as anywhere.

A COOL SUMMER.

Predictions of the Signal Service Men. The cool change yesterday was doubtless a surprise to nearly fevery one. it The observer in charge of the Signal office here says it was the after-effect of the storm which moved across the country two days ago; as the area of highly rarified atmosphere of the storm centre created what might meteorologically speaking be termed a partial vacuum off the North Atlantic coast, into which the denser cool air of the northwest swept with a flank movement to the south. As will be seen from the cotton-belt reports the minimum temperature was very low in the Western part of the State and Charlotte reported frost. The Signal Service also predicts frost this morning for the Western part of the

The warmest weather of last year occurred on May 11th, when the maximum temperature was 97°, but with singular variety, the average for the first eight days of last May was only 63°, while the average for the same period this month is 70°, though the average for yesterday alone was 10° below

The observer here claims that the average temperature and rainfall will in long cycles of time always balance up with their respective normals.

For an illustration of this we have only to look back to last year's record. We had an unusually cool and wet spring and summer, and by October 31st the deficiency of temperature amounted to 431° and the excess of rainfall to four inches. Nature soon asserted itself and the warm dry weather that followed had by January 1st reduced the deficiency of temperature to 108° and the excess of rainfall had decreased to only 11/2 inches.

Now a new start was made January 1st, from which time to this date, we have piled up an excess of 536° in temperature and there is a deficiency of nearly 9 inches of rain to be accounted

According to the theory advanced above, we are to have a cool and rainy summer. The result will be watched with interest, for if it proves true, the science of meteorology scores another

Cotton Region Bulletin.

Frost was reported at Charlotte yesterday morning, with the minimum recorded temperature 42 degrees. The minimum at other stations in the district was 44° at Raleigh, Wadesboro, Weldon and Cheraw, 46° at Lumberton and Goldsboro, 48° at Newbern, and 50° at Florence and Wilmington. Slight rainfall was reported at all stations except Goldsboro and Wadesboro.

Low temperature prevailed throughout the cotton belt. The average miniimum for the districts was: Atlanta, Augusta and Memphis, 42°; Mobile (with frost) and Montgomery, 44°, Charleston and Wilmington, 46°; Vicksburg, Little Rock and Savaanah, 48°; New Orleans, 52°, and Galveston, 62°.

AN OLD-TIME DARKEY.

Uncle Casar-The Representative of Class Rapidly Passing Away.

Just twenty-two years ago to-day bought a plantation on a Southern river. I was on the point of saying that with this property I also bought an old negro named "Cæsar," but the war was over and there was no more trade in slaves. But old Cæsar is and was my hero. Perhaps sixty year sold, he limped along, aided by an old hickory stick with a bent handle, which had become slick and greasy with age. Always upon his back he carried an old sack, with the ends tied with a leather band, enabling him to sling it across his shoulders. In this bag or sack he carried part of an old saw, a hammer with one claw broken off, a jack-knife, a lump of assafædita, a few peach kernels, some strings and a fish hook or two. He complained of rheumatism, that some "pusson" had put a spell on him, and that his legs were full of small snakes which if he could get clear of, he would be all right. Under the willows overhanging the river, he kept a small batteau, and near by fastened to a pole a fish basket, shaped something like a cornucopia; it was baited with bread and assafædita, and captured many a catfish and sucker. It was a horn of subsistance if not of plenty to my old friend. Cæsar was, however, often pinched by hunger and for want of tobacco, but never complained of it; though "his breakfast was a crust, his dinner a question and his supper a regret," he was never known to beg-much less to steal. His house was a mile from the river, and daily he trudged to visit his fish-trap, and if he found his batteau not tied exactly as he left it he thought his luck was gone. On the way he would stop to rest, and when seated on some convenient log or stump, if the weather was cloudy he gave a series of blows, something like those of the porpoiseto blow up a rain, as he said, or to indicate its approach.

He was a sort of portable rice-beater, but he never "extortioned" on his customers; a tea cup full of clean rice being his toll-no more, no less-and his work was always well done. In big jobs of work where many hands were employed in to "boss" the work. He had excellent ideas of lever power, and his great name-sake never felt grander when ordering his tenth legion to clear the field than did my old Cæsar as he would say, "get away men, let me rig my Sampson up thar, and that thing gwine to move; you hear me!" Go by the kitchen, old man, and tell the cook to give you some dinner, was an invitation oftener refused than accepted; and when it was, he always paid for it in some way. A new 'broom-straw" broom, nicely made for the Missus, or an hour's work in the garden, he insisted upon giving in turn or this hospitality. A few sweet crackers put him always in good and talking humor, and many a day their inspiration, he told the stories of his youth, and was full of braggadocia in speak ing of his old owners. They were no "poor buckras," but "big quality peo-

Strange to say, so faithful a creature; one so just and self-denying, made no profession of religion. He held that the person who "gophered him" must take off the spell before he could think of his eternal welfare. "Too much 'flicted" he would say, when asked if he did not desire to make his peace with his Maker. He once had a wife, but "they took her out to Georgia" and he never heard of her, and he seemed entirely callous to Cupid's darts, though he had regard for his personal appearance; his hair was plaited in as long pieces as the nature of the case would admit, and tied at the ends with white cotton strings. He was one darkey who did not claim ownership of a hog. His farming operations consisted in the cultivation of a small potatoe patch and some gourd vines, the soil farther from the shanty being the richer. He could always supply you with a ong-handled gourd, and in fruit season a nice peach, it being remarkable how fruit trees flourished for him. In politics he was Republican usually. He said to a gentleman who had been a candidate for legislative honors, who handed him a piece of tobacco. "Thank you, boss, but if you had offered me tobacco fore de 'election I should not have taken it.' But the March winds, hard alike on poor old men and half-starved cattle, were too much for him and old uncle Cæsar "hung up de fiddle and de bow" and went to the land "where all good

This writer, early in that month, re-ceived a letter from him. It was written apparently with the juice of polk berries on a leaf torn from a memorandum book. It read thus, being written fairly legible: "DEAR SIR :- I'am very bad off, please send me one bunch of raisins and a quart of good corn whiskey by the boat. Send bill to the merchant at the landing and will pay him.

"Yours till death, Not long and the news came that my hero had departed this life. Peace to his ashes-to the rheumatic link that binds us to the past! Soon all like him will have crossed the river, and a generation or two will mark other characters in their day and time, and the old plantation darkey must live in our southern songs only, and the little bit of history which will record the short and simple of the old South.
