men were lowered from the third story windows in this way.

The exhibition of the Pompier service came next. A Pompier ladder is an insignificant looking stick of tough wood about ten feet long, with a series of rungs or pieces of wood stuck through it and a cumbersome-looking F-shaped steel hook at the one end. Such a ladder weighs 42 pounds. When the firemen showed what can be done with them, the ladders were viewed with a great deal of respect. Starting on the level of the first floor a fireman inserted the hooked end of his ladder in the window of the second floor above. Taking another ladder he climbed to the second floor, and then hooked himself up to the third floor. Another fireman followed him and hung a ladder in the fourth floor window. Then lines were made fast to the fourth floor windows and the lower ends were held by firemen on the ground. Then followed a series of life-saving feats. Men supposed to be unconscious and helpless were rescued from the windows, fastened to the stout belts around the firemen's waists, and the firemen by the aid of the ropes and use of their feet, literally walked and slid down the wall.

An exhibition was also given of the method of rescue when the firemen are on the same floor as the person to be rescued, but in adjoining buildings. A star act was the use of a single Pompier ladder to take a fireman from the ground to the fourth floor. This was done by the fireman going up one story at a time and then drawing the ladder after him. The men have a huge steel hook attached to their belts with which they can fasten themselves to the ladders, if they wish to have the free use of their hands. Nos. 15 and 18 engine companies are the only two equipped with the Pompier service, and this part of the exhibition was by members of those companies. Members of Nos. 4 and 6 truck companies participated in the other exercises.

After an advance of over one cent a ap 13 D&W tf pound from the lowest quotations that cotton has touched this year, it is well to take a new survey of the factors which bear upon the market. It is evident on one side, that the parties who were quick to anticipate the changed condition of business, have not participated with entire amount of their holdings, though doubtless they have liquidated a certain proportion of the cotton which they originally carried; but the market is broader at the moment than it has been any time during the year, and therefore the factors must be considered, but not too much weight given to the operation of any one interest in the market, Shoes, Again the outstanding short interest which at one time was of very large proportions has been reduced to a very moderate size, and therefore the market lacks the support which the market usually derives from the covering of an active interest on the short side.

The features in favor of the market are a diminution in the movement of the crop at the interior towns which leads many to believe that the interior holders parted with their surplus supplies at a time when the market has seemed to halt under the liquidation of the holders of contracts. By some it is thought that the falling off in the movement is due to the lack of demand from the continental spinners who, having bought heavily during the past Fall and Winter, are not disposed to continue their purchases as they advance in price, but rather regard the market as having reached a point where they are justified in falling back on their reserve supplies and await further developments regarding the growth of the new crop. The American spinners, however, have been large buyers of cotton on the advance, being influenced by the purchases of cotton goods by the retail merchants who find a better trade awaiting them than they had anticipated. It, therefore, is the policy of commission merchants at the present time to advise conservatism to all of their constituents, waiting further developments regarding the new crop. The weather throughout the Southwest has been extremely dry, and doubtless a beneficial rain would quickly stimulate the plant in Texas. In the rest of the country planting operations are delayed by rainy weather; but it is thought that the advance will have the effect of increasing the acreage in cotton, as it has of increasing the amount of fertilizers to be used. Therefore merchants who are not carried away by the excitement of the advance, are quite prepared to see a reaction from present prices, unless the weather conditions become again unfavorable. It is noticeable that the Southern markets still maintain a relative advance above New York which prevents any large quantity of cotton from being brought here, and it seems likely the tenders on the May position will be taken up as the holders of May contracts have made their necessary arrangements to carry cotton forward six months if necessary.

The future course will be determined by the accounts received from the growing crop, as it must always be remembered that at this season of the year the crop, whether it be 6,000,000 bales or 10,-000,000 bales, has been sold and when spinners or speculators wish to buy they must find some holder willing to dispose of his cotton.
