The storm caused but little damage here. A few fences and trees were blown down, two wood flats on the river were sunk, and much of the wood floated off and was lost. The Weather Bureau reported that the storm was central near Raleigh early | bbls. in the morning, and at 1 o'clock p. m the centre was in East Virginia, moving rapidly northeast.

The Bureau reported that a secondary storm was forming over Texas.

The County Commissioners yesterday let a contract for the erection of another steel bridge. On November 21st, 1875, Mr. Wood invented a system of lighting harbors by electric buoys, and a patent was obtained. The system was offered to the Government but refused. In 1888 the Government adopted Mr. Wood's system. The harbor of New York was first lighted with the buoys. Now these gengrade of paper in old English blacktlemen bring suit to recover $500,000

WALTERS ART GALLERY.

Open to the Public on Certain Days-An

Artistic Descriptive Book by Richard B. Gruelle, [Baltimore Sun. Feb. 5th]

The Walters Art Gallery, in the home of Mr. Henry Walters, at 5 West Mt. Vernon Piace, will be opened to-day to the public for the first time for a year. The arrangement of the late William T. Walters by which his great collection was to be opened on the Wednesdays of February, March and April for the beaefit of the Poor Association has been continued by his son, Mr. Henry Walters. Tickets of admission have to be secured in advance at the headquarters of the Poor Association, on Saratoga street, near Charles street. The modern masterpieces of the Walters collection are described in a unique volume recently is used under the title of "Notes Critical and Biographical on the Collection of William T. Walters."

Richard B. Gruelle is the author of the volume which is edited by J. M. Bowles. Both of them are art connoisseurs of national reputation. The pictures in the collection representing the different schools of modern painting are minutely described in a critical but appreciative spirit, and sepa-rate chapters are devoted to the Bayre collection, the peachbloom vase, a remarkable head in wax said to be by Raphael, the oriental bronzes, the chief water colors, ivories and miniatures. faced type, with side notes and quotations in red. Through the volume are scores of medieval initial letters and headbands, which, with a title page of similar type, are the work of Bruce

Two pages of the volume are taken up with a d scription of the matchless beauty of the peachbloom vase. There has always been a question as to who was really the purchaser of this famous vase when it was so'd at auction at an excessively high price some ten years ago, so that Mr. Gruelle's article must be accepted as the first statement that it is in the Walters collection. Mr. William T. Walters never stated publicly that he owned it, and the vase was never included in that portion of his art treasures shown to the public. Mr Gruelle says of the vase: "It is the perfect flowering of hundreds of years of oriental art, the culmination of centuries of the most sacred devotion to the shrine of beauty. It is a gem that needs no setting; so frail, so perfect, that contrast with things less esthetic seems almost sacri-

In his introduction Mr. Gruelle pays a tribute to Mr. William T. Walters and his collection in these words: "To the artist'as well as the public the educational value of the collection cannot be overestimated. It is an honor to our country and stands as a beautiful moru ment of the true use of wealth. Of him whose life work is treasured in this residence words of praise are unnecessary It is a grand realization of the dreams of his youth-dreams whose fulfillment then was visible only in the boundless possibilities of the green world that lay before him. Like a gardener on the silvery side of lite who is found among the plants and flowers which he has nurtured and seen grow into the fullness of nature, so did he for years watch the development of this beautiful collection, and with loving care constantly added and weeded out until one would linger long ere displacing a single object. Between him and many of the most illustrious of the artists repre sented bonds of triendship have existed which greatly endeared their works to him. His work exemplified in the formation of this collection implies a genius as peculiar and distinct in its way as any of these masters."
