FRIDAY MORNING, AUGUST

MARKETS WHICH LIE AT OUR DOORS.

A few days ago we published an article from the New York Tribune on reciprocity with Cuba in which it commented upon our small sales of cotton goods to that island, and insisted that with reciprocity we might control its cotton goods trade. In that connection it chided the Southern manufacturers for standing in their own light by opposing reciprocity when as a matter of fact it was only some of the representatives of the sugar makers who did that. In that article it incidentally spoke of the importance of cultivating trade with the countries south of us whose trade is practically monopolized by a few European countries. Our portion of that trade is so small that it excites the surprise of the Washington Times, a Republican paper, which asks "what causes it?" when it ought to be able to give reasons enough, if not all, to account for it. Referring to an exhibit by the Treasury Department, it says:

A recently published statement from the Treasury Bureau of Statistics on the subject contains material for serious thought on the part of those who make a special study of the country's commercial relations with a view to finding new markets for the products of American industry. The statement referred to makes the now familiar exhibit of enormous increase in our exports, and then proceeds to show the proportions in which these exports were absorbed, during the past fiscal year, by the various nations of the world. It is this exhibit that furnishes food for reflection. It shows that only 6.6 per cent. of the total found their way to South America, and this in spite of all the efforts that have been made to bring about closer commercial relations with the countries of the Southern part of this continent.

The figures adduced proved that South America takes the bulk of its imports from Europe. It is probable that England and Germany are in the lead of the European nations that export goods to South America countries. Under normal conditoins the United States should carry the largest amount of goods to South American markets, because our closer proximity enables us to put merchandise in South American ports at a cheaper freight rate

Another impediment was the want of ships, nearly all of our trade being done in ships hired from foreigners, and competitors in trade, too. When we hire those ships freight rates cost us more than they cost our European competitor, for he could send a cargo out and bring a cargo back, thus getting lower freight rates both ways, which, of course, gave him that much advantage over his American competitor. The American who desired to make an effort to build up trade with those countries could not buy his ships abroad when they could buy them cheaper than at home, because if he did that our navigation laws denied him the privilege of sailing under his own flag, and he had to raise the flag of tion. There are other reasons why our trade with those countries makes such a poor showing compared with the total trade, but these two, both of which can and should be remedied, are sufficient.

For some time there have been rumors of a movement for a combine between the United States Standard Oil Trust and the two leading oil companies of Europe, which would give the combine control of the world's supply of oil of all grades. The latest is that the deal has been consummated, and now there will be no competition between these companies, the price of oil will be fixed for the world and the consumers will have to pay it, for no individual oil producer or company can hope to compete with such a gigantic combine, with hundreds of millions of dollars behind It was said some time ago that the basis of agreement between these companies was a division of territory, each taking a field of its own which the other would not enter. But line.

whatever the agreement is it puts the oil consumers of the world in the power of this combine for it controls the principal oil wells of the world, and enough of them to defy competition from any other It may be said that this isn't a tesy to this country." Hanna petitors. Such raw material and manfactured products as the South American markets absorb we ought to be able to sell at more reasonable prices than can be quoted by European houses. While it is all right to expand our trade relations into the Far East, it would seem to be the part of wisdom to make more strenuous forts to secure the markets which lie at our very doors. James G. Blaine realized the importance of suchia policy and labored incessantly in that direction. What is it, may well be asked, that causes the nations of South America to draw their imports from Europe rather than from their next door neighbor 1

It calls this statement of the Treasury Department a "pointer for the expansionists." They had pointers some years ago, before expansion became the hobby it has since become, but the fact is our commerce has been for years subordinated by Republican tariff makers to the protection of interests that contributed to Republican campaign funds.

James G. Blaine tried to give them some pointers by which they could encourage and add to our trade with the countries south of us, but the protection seekers either couldn't or wouldn't see them. He lost patience then and condemned the policy which wouldn't "open market for another bushel of wheat or barrel of pork." They finally, to placate him, tacked on a sort of reciprocity clause to the tariff bill. Blaine saw what it was that blocked this trade, and perhaps some of the men he was talking to and remonstrating with saw it, too, but they were too intent upon fixing up : tariff to suit their friends to give much thought to the trade of the 50,000,000 of people south of us, and consequently they let England, Germany, France and Italy get control of that trade, with no effort to prevent it.

The tariff operates against us because the trade with these countries consists largely of barter, or ex change of goods. This is true to : greater or less extent of the trade with all countries, but it is especially true of these for their comparatively limited supply of money compels them to do a large barter business. When the American trader undertakes to do business there he finds himself confronted by his European competitor who exchanges his cargo of merchandise for a cargo of the goods of the people he is dealing with, for he can take that cargo home, where, if he has any tariff duties to pay they are light compared with the American dubefore. ties. The American cannot exchange his goods at a profit, because whatever the difference might
