Tragedy Of a Clock

Caused Death of Lover A few miles from Bardstown, Ky., lives Nathan Colerain and his maiden sister, who is now past middle life. Miss Patsy Colerain is a lady of refinement and bears traces of great youthful beauty. For nearly forty years she has not gone beyond the precincts of her own yard. There is a tragic story connected with her es-In the hall of the Colerain mansion

THE BODY WAS DRAGGED FROM THE CLOCK. since one fateful night in 1864 when it played an important part in a bloody tragedy that broke Miss Patsy Colerain's heart and enveloped her life in a pall of gloom that will never be lifted this side of the grave. In 1864 Miss Patsy Colerain was considered one of the handsomest young women in Nelson county. Of an old line family, wealthy in her own name, she was naturally much sought after and had suitors by the score. Of course she had but one choice, and that was Reuben Morehead, a descendant of one of Kentucky's governors, who claimed Nelson county as his birthplace. Young Morehead was an orphan who had been reared by a neighboring farmer. Patsy had known him all her life and had loved him as far back as she could

The war broke out, and Reuben took up arms for the north. Then followed sad days for the young girl. Her father sickened and died, and her only brother was in the far south battling for the Confederacy. Thus she was left with only the faithful negro slaves and a nephew barely in his teens. At this time the neighborhood was full of guerrillas. "Sue" Mundy and his gang were terrorizing that entire section, and soldiers and civilians alike were falling at their hands. The outlaws were frequently at the Colerain house, and, while Patsy had never suffered any indignities from them, she was in constant terror lest she might. One rainy night in April, 1864, Miss Colerain was sitting before a cheerful fire, her mind busy with thoughts of her absent lover, when suddenly the door opened and young Morehead, attired in a handsome uniform, stood before her. Before she could speak the young soldier caught her in his arms and showered kisses upon her blush-

A second later she broke from his embrace, and, trembling with fright, she remonstrated with him for daring to leave his command and come there alone. The country, she said, was swarming with guerrillas and other enemies to his cause and that if he was caught there his life would pay the penalty. He soon reassured her, however, and convinced her that he could reach his lines, which were not far away, without the least danger to

Happy to have him with her, she nestled up to him on the old sofa, and together they talked of love and the happy times when the cruel war should be over and they should be united, never to part.

While thus engaged there came above the patter of the rain the tramping of many horses. The lovers' faces blanched with terror, for they knew that enemies were upon them. Going to the window, Patsy saw by the faint light of the moon breaking through the clouds that which caused her heart to cease to beat and paralyzed her every thought and motion. The yard was When her speech at last came to her,

"My God, Reuben; it is 'Sue' Mundy and his gang. If they catch you here, it is certain death! Oh, what shall we

By this time the guerrillas were at the door clamoring for admittance. Then it was that an idea came to the distressed girl. "The old cfock, Reuben, get into that," she said. "It is plenty large, and they will never discover you there."

The young man lost no time in clambering into the barrel of the clock, and his sweetheart fastened the door. Then, with a lighter heart, she admitted the guerrillas, who were growling and cursing at the delay.

Filing through the long hall into the cozy sitting room, they took seats and demanded refreshments. Patsy left to comply with their demands, but she had hardly left the dining room when she heard the guerrillas raving and cursing and the report of firearms.

Realizing the worst, she hurried back and reached the hall just in time to witness the murderous outlaws dragging the dead body of her lover from the old clock. At this juncture again came the tramp of horses, followed by more firing and commotion, and then to Patsy came a blank.

. For weeks the girl hovered between life and death, a victim of brain fever. When the dicease left her, she was but a wreck of her former self. When she stronger, they told her that she had neglected to conceal her lover's overcoat and gloves, that the guerrillas discovered them and instituted a search for the young soldier, that the latter threw open the door of the clock, presumably with the hope of making his escape, when he was shot and in-

This story reads like fiction, but nevertheless every word of it is true.

As before stated, one of the actors still lives, and the old clock, with defeated woodwork and read woodworks. faced woodwork and motionless machinery, stands in the self same spot it did on that dreadful night, its brazen hands still marking the hour that the brave young soldier met his ignominious death.

THE ASPARAGUS BED. If you want to set out an asparagus bed this spring, do this: Cut old roots into three or four pieces with a sharp spade, prepare your bed, digging up to a depth of a foot. Fertilize heavily, using well rotted stable manure, or the surplus cats and dogs of your neighborhood could be well planted right here and give good returns. Cut none at all the first year and sparingly the second, but after that as liberally as you like. Do not cut after June 20, but allow all the growth to mature on the bed.
