Counsel for the railroads after which the remains were taken insisted that for the act to go into effect now would greatly increase the expense of this department of railroad service and that there were not really enough telegraphers available and that ere long now the National law will be operative and meet every need of the case, and that with the privelege of working some of the men twelve hours when necessary the service would be greatly benefitted and the interests of the railroads and the operators protected.

On the other hand the opponents of the petition insisted that to grant the petition would impose a hardship on the operators who at the small stations have to serve as operator, depot agent, mail agent and half dozen capacities of service, the long/hours and the multiplicity of duties giving rise to innumerable possibilities of error that would endanger the lives of train crews and hundreds of passengers. The Commission has taken the petition and arguments under advisement
