The Atlanta Constitution calls for the abolition of the credit system in Georgia, and says: "This system has become an institution. It is an institution built up and fostered by a spe-cies of legislation little short of vicious. Nearly all our laws since the war have been made in the in-terest of the debtor class. They have all been in the direction of establishing a vicious credit system, and out of this our people and our business interest must work their way as best they may. It is not easy to suggest a remedy. The farmer indebted to the small provision dealer is compelled to pitch his crop pretty much at the dictation of the latter. This is the secret of the all cotton policy which the majority of our farmers are compelled to pursue, although they know it is ruinous in the end."

The Co-Ordinate Power of the States and the Federal Government.

American Register, Dem.

This is one of the most essential, indeed, vital points in our political system. While the Federal Government was made supreme within the sphere of its delegated powers, the States were left supreme within the sphere of their reserved powers. The powers of the former were specially defined in the Constitution, and the 10th article provided, that "The pow-ers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." Prior to the adoption of the Constitution each State was fully recognized as a distinct community or people, clothed with all the governmental powers of an independent nation, and was so expressly declared in the treaty of peace with England at the close of the American Revolution.

This division and co-ordination of powers thus fixed by the Constitution was the chiaf corner-stone in the Union of the States. Without it the Union could never have been formed. These co-ordinate powers, the States and the Federal Government, were intended as mutual checks upon each other, and safeguards against the abuse and usurpation of power.

It is the manifest intention of the Republican party to revolutionize our political system in this regard by subordinating the States, and centralizing all supremacy of power in the Federal Government. This would effectuate a destruction of the Government in its fundamental principle and lead inevitably to a centralized and overshadowing despot-
