POLITICS AND SELFISHNESS.

It would not be such a difficult matter to adjust our currency system on a satisfactory basis if it were not for the politics and selfishness that enter as disturbing factors. The first question the professional politician of the aspiring kind asks when a financial proposition is broached is how it will be regarded-favored or opposed-by those to whom he looks for his support, and in nine cases out of ten his position on that proposition is taken accordingly. It may be added that nine out of ten of them give very little thought or study to financial problems although they may talk volubly on them, simply echoing the utterances of those whom they serve because it is to their interest to serve them.
