like her mother, whom he had married for her beauty and her grace 20 years ago, Mr. Pownell sighed. This is a scandalous world, as we all know. Mrs. Grundy had dived deep into Mr. Pownell's private history long ere this and had always averred that Mrs. Pownell, with all her beauty, was only a coquette, who thought much more of exhibiting her charins in public than of making the home of her husband

1% this as it may, it is certain that Mrs. Pownell, still handsome—she was many years younger than her husband-sat at that moment in her drawing room, entertaining two handsome and courteous officers belonging to one of the French vessels then lying in the bay, while Georgina and her young friends were laughing and gosbeing with three more officers in the garden. It is also certain that though Mr. Pownell was a polite and attentive cavalier to his wife and daughter whenever they required his services, he would as soon have gone for sympathy in trouble or disrace to the man in the moon or to the Egyptian sphynx as to either of these.

le listened now to the light talk and laughter rippling up from below, with a curious expression on his face. It was opera night, and he was in full evening dress, for in the course of an hour he was to egent the ladies to their box. Meanwhile he was best in his study-they with their guests.

Opera night! An oragn out in the square suddenly struck up one of the very handmed it mechanically. And then the stop was changed and an old, old air rang out-an air that he had thought sweet and sad and full of the most plaintive melody once! Once! It must have been a hundred years or more since he stood beside the pasturn bars of the "old home farm" and heard a sweet young voice trill out the plaintive music. Those "long time ago" days were over forever for him! For his fashionable wife and stately daughter they had never been. In his own life, harassed and anxious as it had often been at times, was a store of experience such as they had never known. The organ played on, and the rich man's thoughts went wandering back to the old red farmhouse. He saw himself a "barefoot boy," driving the cows home, with a Birtle blue eved child in a pink gingham and sunbonnet trotting by his side. He saw himself a lad at school, and the pink gingham frock sat near him. He saw himself later still a spruce clerk in a country store. The pink gingham had changed to a lawn sprinkled with forgetmenots as blue as the wearer's eyes or his own! He glanced at the glass now. His own were Pretty, gentle, quiet little Susie Gray! How sweetly those blue eyes looked up at him over the pasture bars by moonlight that night! How plainly he could hear the soft, clear voice still-sweet, but with a dash of sadness in it all the time! How he had loved her then, with all the ardor of a boy's first love! How meekly and modestly she had returned that more boisterous affection! How pure she was-how

The organ ceased. The man was moving away, when a purse clanked on the pavement at his feet. He saw the hand that had thrown it to him close the blind, and the poor Italian went away elated. Susie, oh, if I had but been as true as you were! If you were only my wife now -if my child was your daughter-how different life might be!" groaned the man as he flung himself into his seat. He touched a spring in the safe that stood gien before him, and a secret door slid out. It contained only two things-a withered wrings blossom and a tress of chestnut mir. Poor as the treasures were, they were more than house or lands to the lone-

Alas! His repentance came too late for atenement, as repentance almost always does in this weary world of ours. He had left the girl he loved-deserted her for the sake of his ambition, and when he would have returned to her she was lying in the willage churchyard, and the age upon the stone above her head was "23." Like one in a dream the rich man sat, his face bent down upon the hair, which was wet with his falling tears. Presently came a light tap at the door. 'Papa, we are nearly ready," said a lady's voice. "Mamma has rung for the

There was a slight pause. Very well, dear," said Mr. Pownell, with an effort, in his usual tone. Ten minutes later he came out, locked the study door behind him and handed his wife and daughter to the carriage with his usual grave courtesy. He kept in the back of the box that evening and was very si-

When six months later the rich man died after a short illness, those who prepared kim for his burial found resting upon his heart a little locket containing a woman's hair. They left it there, and it was buried with him. Mrs. Pownell knew nothing of it. I doubt if it would have troubled her much if she had been told .- New York Advertiser.

The One Who Trusts.

A little fable says: "Once there was a foolish woman who continually mistook brass and other inferior articles for gold. She derived much innocent amusement from her credulity. And once there was a wise woman who knew that of all things that glittered very few were gold. And because of her skepticism she let much preclous metal escape her." Who gets the most out of life, she who sees gold in evcrything or she who shuns aid that glitters, fearing to find brass? An overcredulous person must of necessity sometimes suffer from keen disappointment and disillusion, but in the long run he is much happier than he who is oversuspicious. I am much inclined to think that the on who trusts is less often deceived than the one who suspects .- Kansas City Times.

HOME CHARITY.

Aminta, charming and aristocratic in the vastly becoming dress of an order. Marcia, ditto, ditto, in the vastly becoming dress of another order. Scene—A coffee palace in the east end.
Aminta—You here! The very last person I should have thought of seeing. What in the world brings you to these parts? And what a sweet little love of a bonnet and cloak! Marcia-You, Aminta! You can't think how deliciously refreshing it is to see somebody you used to know before you had an object in life! I wish I had known before I made up this costume for myself that there was an order with such a perfect dream of a dress as yours. I don't think it interferes with one's moral influ-ence and—er—power over the masses to be properly got up, do you? Come and have some tea—a penny cup—and tell me where you are staying and what you are doing

Aminta-Two lumps? I gave up sugar last month, on principle, you know-I haven't an idea what principle—and now quite dislike it, which is a perfect blessing, because the self denial goes on all the same, you see, and the unpleasantness doesn't. Oh, I'm living in Henrietta street, and I'm elevating the people. I must have been doing it almost three weeks, I think, and papa said-fathers are so unsympathetic-that it was only a freak and wouldn't last. It is so horribly clean and respectable that I assure you for the first week I was perfectly miserable. Marcia-Yes, I know that feeling myself, where I am in Powers court. A court sounds beautifully immoral, don't you think? But I assure you there hasn't been a single brawl or even a drunken Irishman since I have been there, while some of the children actually have a clean pinafore once a week and a bath every fortnight. How do you elevate your Aminta-Well, I don't know exactly. A man from Oxford-such an exquisite, intellectual face, only rather spoilt by the most frightful boots-gives the sweetest little classes on Swinburne and Rossetti and that sort of thing. I go to keep the masses in order, only there never have been any masses, quite fortunately for me, except one mass, who was a costermonger, who came in because of the stove, he said, and went to sleep all the time. And then there are teas for feathers and fringes, and you have to try to drop in a few refining words with the sugar. And what is your order for, Marcia? Marcia (readily)-Oh, it's called the Society For the Amelioration of the Condition of the Poor In Their Own Homes,' and it means that you call on them and tell them not to hang out their washing to dry in the sitting room-they haven't anywhere else to hang it, you know, but that's not your fault—and how to bring up 14 children on 10 shillings a week and that kind of thing, which would be easy enough, only it is so dreadfully discourage ing when you find out, as you always do, that the poor really seem to know more about their own business than you do. What-er-made you go in for elevating.

Aminta? Aminta (with confusion and a slight blush)—Go in for it? Marcia (putting down her cup and look ing up with interest)-Yes. Aminta-Ob, I' don't know exactly. Lots of things. The world seems always rather hollow at the end of the season, don't you think? And we were going to be buried alive for the rest of the year in Hampshire, where, mamma said-mamma is so effete, you know-I should find lots of duties awaiting me, which was enough to discourage any girl. And I looked over somebody's articles-I forget whose-in a magazine-I forget whichall about woman's work, Woman with a capital, you know, and-Marcia (with a sigh)-How odd!

was just the same with me. Aminta (sympathetically)-With you? Marcia-Almost exactly. I'd tried ev erything, you know. I had been in for golf and skirt dancing and literature and rational dress and new womanhood and reciting and cooking and novel writing and bleycling and everything, but it was-all-Aminta (sentimentally)-Bran and saw

Marcia-I wasn't a bit hasty, I assure you. So when I found out that in the Soclety For the Amelioration, etc., you know, ou could choose your own dress and only had to do with the refuse of the popula tion I had the sweetest selection of caps and bonnets and decided finally. Aminta (with tender admiration)-Hov brave of you! Marcia-Well, it was rather. My peopl persecuted me dreadfully. And Tom would say, when people remarked to him "How sweet of your sister," "Oh, she's beer crossed in love, I suppose. They all do it.' Aminta (with a start and a blush)-Tom! And that's just what Charlie-you used to know Charlie when you were in the world, didn't you?-says about me.

Marcia (with a blush)-Charlie? (There is a long pause.) Aminta-Was it Charlie, Marcia? Marcia-Was it Tom, Aminta?

(There is the longest pause of all.) Aminta-Because if it should have bee Charlie it wasn't that he did not care for you, but that until Uncle Julian most houghtfully died last week he hadn't enough money to say he cared for you. Marcia-Was it that? And if it should have been Tom, Aminta, until he got his commission, you know, a sense of honorsuch an inconvenient thing, isn't it?prevented him from telling you his real eelings.

(A pause.) Marcia-Can you come to tea with me tomorrow? Five, Powers court, you know. Tom might be there too. Aminta-I shall be delighted, if you don't mind my bringing Charlie, who is coming to see me in Henrietta street.

Marcia (as they part)-Shall you much mind coming down from your elevation, Aminta-Shall you dreadfully miss your society for ameliorating, Marcia?—Black

A Remarkable Potato. Andrew Maxwell, a well known merchant in Glasgow, was in the island of Arran some years ago with his mother and sisters. The weather was unusually warm, and his venerable mother suffered so much from the heat that her hands became swollen, and as her marriage ring was fretting her finger one of her daughters, after no little coaxing, persuaded her to allow its removal. To the dismay of the daughter the ring was lost, but she procured another so like the old one that the change was not noticed when it was placed on her finger. Next year the family went back to the same house, and in the autumn, when the farm servant in a neighboring building, having boiled potatoes for the pigs, was crushing a potato in her hand, she felt something hard, and, on looking at this thing inside the potato, she exclaimed to one of the Maxwell servants who was beside her, "Here's a ring in the potato," and showed a thin, worn marriage hoop. "I beneve," said the other, "it is my mistress' ring, and we can find that out because her initials were inside the hoop." On examining it there were the initials, and the lost ring was identified. It had evidently been swept out among the ashes, the ashes thrown upon the ash pit, the contents of the ash pit on the potato field, and the ring absorbed by the

WOLVES AND BULLS.

AN INCIDENT OF AN OVERLAND WIN-TER TRIP IN COLORADO.

Strategy of Seven Big Gray Wolves In Search of a Cow Dinner—The Tide of Battle Turned by the Timely Arrival of the Texas Bull.

"We pulled out from Hermosina among the foothills at 9 o'clock in the morning on a clear, cold February day," said Albert Bragdon, just returned from winter-ing in Colorado. "The wind blew strong and stiff across the heavy snowfall left on the ground after the blizzard storms. The gulches were packed full of snow, and we turned from the road time and again to circle around some large drift. I was the only passenger, and I sat beside Hank' Benedict, the overland driver, now reduced in these railroad days from his high seat on the box to the tooling of a pair of horses over the dashboard of a buckboard on a star route mail line. We were protected from cold by heavy overcoats, caps that pulled down over the ears, mufflers about the neck and thick fur lined gloves. An hour after noon we came to a little stage and freighting station whose leading feature was a large saloon and small hotel combined. Here we had a chance to get warm and to eat a dinner of fried beef, bacon and coffee, which went not badly in the hunger that followed our cold morning's ride. "Off again in a half hour through a country more open, where drifts were the exception. Hank Benedict had taken a drink or two at the stage station, and he was more sociable than he had been during the morning's drive. He talked of old overland experiences and then of the snow-storm, which led to the topic of the plague of wolves which had come to devour the ranchmen's stock.

"T've heard 'em howling whenever I've been driving after dark for the last month,' said Hank. 'They're getting sassier and sassier. They've crossed the trail just in front of me time and again, and I expect any time a band of 'em may take a notion to hold me up. There's one of the murdering brutes now.' And he pointed to a gray timber wolf sneaking along parallel to our course 150 yards away.

" 'There's a winchester in the buckboard behind you that I've taken along with me every trip since the last snowfall. You can try a shot at him if you want to.' "I got out of the buckboard and took the winchester rifle from the bottom, where it lay wrapped in a rubber blanket. It was cold and frosty to handle, but I was glad of a chance to stretch my limbs and try what I could do at long range. At each of my first two shots the animal dodged and then looked around as if wondering what was up. The third shot knocked the snow about him and quickened his pace. I fired two more shots as he ran, and the sixth time the hammer fell on an empty barrel. There were no more cartridges in the magazine. "There was no more ammunition along, and I put the rifle back with the promise to Hank to buy him a box of cartridges at Battensberg. We would have liked very much to have the cartridges with us a few minutes later, when, on turning the slope of a hill, we saw a strange and thrilling sight. Within rifle shot to one side seven gray wolves were attacking two cows, one a long horned Texan, the other a graded heifer almost grown. The cattle when first we saw them were running away, but they were quickly overhauled. They turned at bay to face the wolves and began a fight which must be fought to a finish, with their lives as the stake. The cows kept together, wheeling to meet the wolves with their horns, as an attack was threatened from one side or the other. The wolves didn't like the looks of the Texan's horns and the alert way she handled them, and they devoted their principal attention to trying to separate the heifer from her. They worked in concert very cunningly to do this. While one or two made feints of attacking the old cow, so as to induce her to chase them, the others kept about the heifer, three of them drawing her attention in front, while two kept in her rear waiting for a chance to spring at her gambrels and hamstringher. But the wary cow was not to be tempted so far away that she could not return in time to drive away the wolves at the heifer's flank before they began their work. The ultimate chances of the battle seemed to be against the cattle, for the wolves, all the time closing in upon them, were growing bolder and attacked more flercely. "But there came a timely diversion in aid of the cattle. A bellowing from among some pinon clumps a quarter of a mile away was followed by the appearance of a large bull which came running toward the combatants. He was of the polled Angus breed, and his hornless head did not seem quite to meet the case of wolves, but he was big and full of fight. He put himself at once in front of the cows and charged determinedly upon the wolves, which fell back a little before him; but, fully aware that he had no horns to toss them, they gave no more ground than they had to and returned to close in about the group of cattle, still trying to cut out the heifer, which all the time was their real object of

"So absorbed was I in the battle that I did not notice the coming of a fourth combatant upon the scene until I heard Hank's exclamation:

"Ah, we'll see business begin now There's the fellow that'll scatter 'em.' "From the same direction that the bull had come another bull was coming to the rescue. He was a wiry animal, less masand his long, sharp horns, projecting well to the front of his head, showed his Texan origin. He wasted no time in pawing or bellowing, but dashed upon three of the wolves ranged in front of the helfer, and before they could all get out of the way he had caught one with his horns and tossed it in the air. The wolf came to the ground upon his back, and before it could turn the bull was upon it again, thrusting his horns through the creature's body and pinning it to the earth. Then with an angry toss of the head he flung the carcass away. That was enough for the wolves. who turned and ran as he successively charged them, and they were surveying the cattle from a long distance away as we drove from the scene of a fight that had delayed the United States mail three-quarters of an hour.-New York Sun.

Overathleticism. The body can be killed through one organ, and in youth and middle age mortal injury of body and mind come usually through one organ as the primary seat of evil. It is an evil of frequent occurrence and greatly on the increase. A man is said to "throw himself, heart and soul, into his work." Such a man is in danger. He has four great parts of his body to consider—his heart and blood system, his lungs and other organs associated with breathing, his muscles, his brain and nervous system. But he does not heed them at all. He runs or cycles excessively, and in a much shorter time than he has the least idea of he makes his heart too strong for the rest of his organism and endangers the finer ramifications of the vessels which are under the domination of the heart. He rows without studying consequences, and long before he is convinced the chest mechanism which may soon be permanently established.

He takes to some muscular training, which puts the muscular organs to an extreme of tension. Large and small muscles alike are exposed to strain, both the strong muscles that give propulsion and the delicate muscles that guide, and before he has become conscious of the error he has committed he is a strained man, from which predicament he is fortunate if he make anything like a complete recovery. Another man enters into competitions in which his mental organs are kept awake for long intervals, charged with expectations, anxieties, fears, nay, excess of satisfaction, and while he is yet young he grows old. -Saturday Review.
