pardon and the report of the I stole down to the house and climbe up a trellis to the window. It was summer, and the window was open. There was no one in the room, but a light on a table showed me by the presence of clothing, pipes, tobacco and such things scattered about that it was a man's room. I waited on the piazza roof till after 9 o'clock, when the young man entered, took off his clothes and went to bed. He looked nervous and haggard.

> What I was after was to see him under the influence of his vision without his knowing of my presence. His aunt had doubtless excited him by telling him that I was coming, and he would be pretty sure to see the ghost. I could hear him tossing in the bed, but as the lamp was not lighted I could not see him. I waited till nearly 11 o'clock, when he had quieted down, and I thought he was asleep. But suddenly he gave a shrick, and I could faintly see him sitting up in bed, doubtless staring at his vision. I cast my eyes about the room, and to the left, near a door, I saw a luminous white figure, apparently of a woman. For a moment I was taken aback I had no idea of anything appearing except to the young man's excited brain. Here was something that I could see myself. Then it occurred to me that the ghost's garments had been rubbed with phosphorus. The figure stood a few moments and was turning to go before I gathered my faculties, but suddenly under an impulse sprang into the window, dashed across the room and seized its skirts just as it had got into the hall. Then with one arm around a buxom waist I drew the apparition back into the room, took out my matchbox and lit the lamp. My next move was to pull a piece of white muslin from the apparition and expose the head and shoulders of the aunt.

"Who are you?" she cried angrily. "I'm the man that wants to buy this farm, alias the doctor who was to come here to examine your nephew. He doesn't need any examination. It is plain that you are anxious to shut him up, doubtless with a view to being appointed his guardian and getting a hand on his property." The young man was astonished that his ghost was human and at the same time shocked at what his aunt had been doing. Then he fell into a rage with her and despite my efforts to prevent drove her out of the house. When I returned to the city and related my experience to some of my
