"RARITY OF A TRUE GENTLEMAN. -Perhaps a gentleman is a rarer Which of us can point out many such in his circle; men whose aims are generous, whose truth is constant, ruling as is applied to Insurance and not only constant in its kind but elevated in its degree; whose want of meanness makes them simple: who can look the world honestly in the face with an equal, manly ympathy for the great and small? We all know a hundred whose coats are very well made, and a score who have excellent manners, and one or two happy beings who are in what they call the inner circle and have shot into the very centre and bullet's eve of fashion: but of gentlemen, how many? Let us take a little scrap of paper and each ma're out his list.

> We are pleased that Thackeray says, "a little scrap of paper;" for there will be space enough on it for the purpose. On the the back of the same "little scrap" might be written he names of one's friends.

FRENCH ECONOMY.-A French family can live and live well, on less than would be considered sufficient to save from starvation an American family of the same numbers. An intelligent Bostonian, who had spent some years in France, said to me last summer, in speaking of the economical habits and skill in cookery of the French people, that a French could be supported luxuriously on the waste of one of our large American hotels. The remark was not lar were understood and practiced in the United States as it is in France if our people knew as well how to make most of their provisions as the French do, the cost of living, as far as food is regarded, in most of the States would be reduced more than fifty per cent. Domestic economy, as a rule, is neither practiced nor understood by Americans as it is in France. It may not be too much to say that the entire population of France could be supported on food which is literally wasted in the U. States. The number of people who live beyond their income is less, and the number of those whose incomes exceed their expenditures is greater Programme of Exercises at the National Cemetery, May 31st,

The Beecher-Tilton Trial.

Brooklyn City Court Thursday, a large portion of it being ladies. After a caution to the audience by the Judge to keep entirely quiet, Mr. Evarts began his address for the defense, occupying the entire session of the court. His remarks were, in the main, introductory only, describing the diversities and extraordinary magnitude of the case, saving that it would require fabulous powers to grasp, explore and to throw light upon it. Reference was made to the verdict of the Committee of Six, which, counsel thought, should have satisfied all candid and honest minds. But Beecher had again to submit his case in a court of the plaintiff's own choosing, where they had been for five months in weather as the night which incold as Mr. Moulton and Mr. troduced Beecher's friendship, and that to a degree as warm as that of that 2d of June on which Mrs. Moulton smothered Mr. Beecher's grief with an afghan. Counsel contended that this attack of Tilton was not so much upon Beecher as it was on public morality. Allusion was made to Mrs. Woodhull, who, he said, had rent asunder the entire decalogue. The incredibility and improbability of such a crime having been committed by "two such excellent people" was strongly dealt upon. Concluding, counsel, after an explanation to the jury of the nature and value of circumstantial evidence, commented with much severity upon the character of the evidence introduced by the plaintiff.

Continuing the pursuit, on the 7th they met a lad by the name of Fonderin in an old field. The lad had a brother and relations in Ferguson's camp, and from information obtained from him the plan of the battle was formed. It was resolved that the force should be equally divided, one part going to the right to occupy the South East side of the mountain, the other should go to the Northwest side, and move forward untill they formed a junction, and then all face to the front and then press the enemy up the sides

At this stage of action, Hambrite and Winston had met, and a brisk fire was poured upon Ferguson's men around the mountain. As he would advance towards Campbell, Sevier, Winston and Hambrite, he was pursued by Shelby, McDowell, Williams and Cleveland. When he would turn his force against the latter the former would press on in pursuit. Thus he struggled on, maing charges and retreats, but his left was rapidly losing ground. His men were rapidly falling before the skillful aim and unbending courage of the Whigs. Even after being wounded, he lought on with courage. He made every effort that could
