Beyond the Arraignment of War. A false impression prevails with some Northerners in regard to the obligations of the Southern people. An enlightened community, having determined a political course by a majority in arms, would exhibit a most dignified and patriotic spirit, in demanding from their oppressors the annihilation of the political laws that govern human nature.

A people of noble and generous instincts cannot be expected to stigmatize a cause for which they have suffered so much, in which they perilled their lives and fortunes, and that, in their estimation, is consecrated by the blood of their best and bravest.
