Unionists in the South
Of all the absurd and unfounded notions existing in the North respecting the South, we know of none more prevalent and pernicious than the one so industriously circulated by Radical agents as to the personal dangers which Northern men of Union sentiments have to encounter in the South.

The latest thing of the kind we have noticed in the Nation, in which somebody writing from the South—we know not which point is particularly alluded to—says: "No Northern man who has not lived here can possibly conceive at what point a man utters a Union sentiment."

Now, whatever amount of truth there may have been in such a statement immediately prior to the breaking out of the war, when every one was preparing for a death struggle in which friends and to be known from enemies, we are persuaded that, taking the whole Southern States in the aggregate as they exist to-day, a grosser and more indiscriminate libel was never penned against any people.

The Southern men are in such large numbers, as the Radicals are so fond of asserting (whenever they have anything to gain by that kind of argument), what a mighty spirit they must be floating in the face of our late domination. Who has ever done any harm to them? These men, hated as they are for taking an active part in every Radical attempt to outrage and vilify the people among whom they live, go on proclaiming from the house-tops negro suffrage and the social equality of the negro with the white man, with an earnestness that even Wendell Phillips himself could not surpass; and yet who molests them?

Wardwell's negro speech in Richmond, on the 4th of July last, was something so disgusting to the whole population of the South, that it may fairly be doubted if any Southern man could have stood up in Faneuil Hall and as freely given his opinion about New England fanaticism without being mobbed. Every one who has resided in the South since the close of the war knows that everywhere, and constantly, the most earnest discussions are to be heard between men of Northern and Southern sympathies, without any hindrance on either side to the fullest and freest expression of opinion.

If the writer in the Nation simply meant to say that hawking, ranting, aggressive fanaticism, going South for the mere purpose of insulting everybody and abusing everything they meet, may get into personal trouble, we can easily understand and believe him. We presume that any one determined to get his skull cracked, by his own willful and unwarlike treatment of others, may succeed in getting that operation performed for him in the South, as well as anywhere else; but no decent man of ordinary consideration believes that the politics of the most Radical stamp, run the risk of any incivility. Men who in mere civility "do unto others as they would they should do unto them," find themselves no more molested in the South than in any portion of the North. Where individual exceptions occur, they may be safely set down as the result of drunken brawls, which are liable to occur in one place as well as another, or may be traced to some Radical fanatic who denied the term "Unionist" to everybody but himself, and whose insolent bigotry and impudent intolerance first paved the way to a misunderstanding. Enmity toward Northern men, and especially toward the Union, is not the leading spirit of the South, we care not what a few fanatics among them may say or do to create a contrary opinion. They are simply like their friends and hate their enemies. If their friendship is slow, distrustful, and calculating at first, toward all Northerners, it is but natural that it should be so—ours would be toward them, were that we are the more powerful; but, even when they cannot eagerly hold out the warm hand of fellowship, all trustworthy testimony goes to prove that they, at least, treat with kindness and respect all who go among them with the intention of meeting them in a similar spirit, no matter what their political opinions.—New York World.
