THE SENTINEL.

Thursday, November 8, 1866.

[From Barry of Eagle's Nest.]

A Feat of Horsemanship in Winchester by General Ashby.

In falling back Jackson left absolutely nothing behind for his adversary. Everything was removed, and the laughing infantry greeted with jests and cheers an enormous railway engine, which, drawn by a long string of horses, moved on with the rest.

Jackson remained last, and his critical eyes peered in every direction, to discover whether anything had been forgotten.

"Is everything removed, Major?" he said to his chief quartermaster, Major Harman.

"Everything, General."

"No commissary stores whatever are left?"

"None, General."

"And those broken cars at the depot?"

"They cannot be moved."

"Burn them, Major."

"I will, at once, sir."

"And the telegraph wire?"

"Is cut, sir."

"But, is it removed?"

"No, General."

"Remove it, Major."

Jackson then added: "Take your time. I am in no hurry to leave Winchester."

Soon the broken cars were burning, the wire was rolled up and placed in wagons, and the work was complete.

"Very good," said Jackson, when the report was brought to him; and he sat down under a tree, and folding his hands across his breast, fell quietly asleep.

He had been up all night, and never was able to go without sleep.

The steady approach of the firing now indicated that the enemy was pressing Ashby closely near the suburbs of the town. I rode in that direction, and reaching the rising ground at the head of Loudoun street, where the remains of the old fort, built by Major George Washington about 1790, may still be seen, encountered the cavalry, falling back in good order before the Federal advance. The rear guard, under the personal command of Ashby, who was mounted on a snow-white horse, was disputing obstinately every foot of ground; the main column meanwhile defiling through the streets to form in line south of the town.

I had just reached this point when a sudden rush of the Federal cavalry broke through the rear-guard, and before I knew it, almost, I was by Ashby's side, in the midst of a squadron of blue-coats, banging away with their pistols, and snatching with sabres. The sweep of Ashby's weapon was magnificent, and he seemed to launch himself from the saddle at every blow. He and his splendid animal seemed one, and it is impossible to describe his face. It was on fire, the eyes blazing, he looked happy.

I had no time to bestow upon him more than a glance, however. A sabre cut nearly unseated me, and the blue cordons was all around us, when a determined charge from one of Ashby's squadrons drove back the enemy, and he chased them two hundred yards north of the place.

"I don't like to be crowded."

And placing himself at the head of his men he waved his sword, and cried in a clear, calm voice, strikingly in contrast with his irate appearance:

"Follow me."

Those clear accents seemed to thrill the men. They responded with a wild cheer, and driving his white horse to a furious speed, Ashby burst the Federal line like a tornado.

Before the furious onslaught, so sudden and desperate, the enemy's cavalry gave way. Ashby was in front of his line, cutting right and left with the sabre; and when a few minutes afterward, he came back, his white horse dancing on all four feet, as the nervous hand reined him in amid a shower of balls, his face was calmer—for the moment he seemed satisfied.

He continued to retire slowly, and reached the suburbs of the town. The enemy did not at once move forward. The Confederate cavalry passed through, and it was not until I reached the Southern suburbs that I missed Ashby.

Turning, I saw him seated on his white horse in the middle of Loudoun street, looking quietly at the Federal cavalry and infantry pouring into the place. It is impossible to conceive anything more calmly indifferent than his attitude. He seemed to have taken his place there to witness some peaceful pageant, and to regard the advance of the Federal masses, now nearly in contact with him, with languid curiosity.

All at once some shots were fired at him; but he took no notice of them. This seemed to enrage the enemy, and a detachment charged him at full gallop, firing as they came.

Ashby waved his hand around his head, uttered a cheer, and then, drawing his revolver, galloped off, firing as he went.

I had never reached the suburbs, when suddenly I saw two Federal cavalrymen issue from a side street, and post themselves in the middle of the street to intercept him. I rode rapidly forward to warn him of his danger; but it was not necessary. He turned, saw them, and charged the two men, with a glew of unmitigated pleasure upon his features. One fell, shot through the heart; then his barrels being all emptied, he seized the second by the throat.

I then witnessed one of those spectacles which are supposed to be confined to romance. Borne on at a furious speed upon his powerful white horse, Ashby dragged his adversary clear out of his saddle, beyond relaxing his clutch, and in a moment was never pursued, still dragging his prisoner by the side of his horse.

A cheer rose from his men as Ashby released the prisoner, and coolly looked at the disposition of his command. His foot was again cast, and the expression had come back, and when he said, "Well, Major, they are laughing at us now, I suppose by this time, his voice was as sweet and gentle as when speaking of his dead brother.
