RALEIGH, N. C., TUESDAY, JULY 9, 1867.

NO. 283.

THE SENTINEL.

W. M. PELL, PROPRIETOR.

From the Charleston Courier, 1772-1867.

To-day, ninety-one years ago, the thirteen colonies, including those now Southern States, Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, North Carolina and South Carolina, by their Representatives in the Congress of the United States of America, assembled, adopted their allegiance to the British Crown, dissolved all political connection between Great Britain and themselves, and declared themselves free and independent States.

Relying upon the protection of the Divine Providence and pledging to each other in this cause, their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honors, they entered that long and arduous contest which terminated in the full acknowledgment of their independence.

On the 3d September, 1783, the treaty of peace was solemnly signed by which the colonies, as a nation, both self and them, was declared to be a free, sovereign and independent State.

The words of the first article are as follows:

"Article 1. His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, viz New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia, to be free, sovereign and independent States; that he treats with them as such; and for himself, his heirs and successors, relinquishes all claims to the government, property and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof."

These States, thus separate and equally sovereign, appointed deputies to meet in Philadelphia in May, 1787, for the purpose of framing a Constitution, in the words of the instructions to those from South Carolina, "adequate to the actual situation and future good government of the Confederate States."

This was framed, and upon being ratified and confirmed by nine of the States, each for itself, on the 29th of May, 1790, became the Constitution of the States so ratifying, and from that day to this, is the only legal bond of Union, under which justice is to be established, domestic tranquility ensured, the common defense provided, the general welfare promoted and the blessings of liberty secured to the people of every State, and to their posterity.

Of the States thus ratifying, it is not a little singular, however diverse their opinions since, that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, South Carolina, New Hampshire and New York continued the Constitution, with reservations expressive of their views on the power of the Federal Congress, which are to-day the subject of anxious discussion. Of these New York and Virginia accompanied their ratification with an express declaration in terms of the right of secession. The former announced as its understanding: "That the powers of Government may be retained by the people, and that should become necessary to their happiness. The latter, in the name and in behalf of the people of Virginia, made known "that the powers granted under the Constitution, being derived from the people of the United States, may be resumed by them whenever the same shall be perceived to be inconsistent with the general liberties of the people."

"They are concerned in the language of the Massachusetts ratification, "that all powers not expressly delegated by the aforesaid Constitution are reserved to the several States, to be by them exercised." So jealous were the founders of the Republic, to quote from the former ratification, to remove the doubt, and to preserve the right of the good people of the Commonwealth and more especially guard against an undue administration of the Federal Government.

And to-day, while these fears were not groundless, it is now claimed for the Federal Government that no powers are reserved to the States, or to be by them exercised, but that the Government is a consolidated nationality and is independent of the States."

The Washington Chronicle, the leading organ at the seat of Government of the controlling party of the country, on the very eve of the anniversary of the principles of our independence, announces that about the slightest dispute as to the right of secession, the Constitution is to be interpreted.

It arraigns the statesman who formed the Constitution, and under whose guidance the affairs of the country were so successfully conducted for over three-quarters of a century.

It asserts that the "earlier statesmen were wrong in their duty, in not having exercised the authority reserved to the States, and the nation would have been rendered homogeneous."

"The government is a consolidated nationality, not a league of confederation. It was created by the people, and is independent of the States. It is the only government and guarantor of the rights of the people, and it follows as a necessity, that the form guaranteed cannot be changed without the permission of the guarantor."

In other words, that under this latter phrase no State can change or amend its Constitution, in the slightest degree, without having first obtained the consent and sanction of Congress.

Married was one of the original thirteen States, which united in the Declaration of Independence, and which framed the Constitution and formed the Union under which we are living. It has never been out of the Union. Its Convention, as that of New York and other States, is now in session, revisiting its fundamental law. And now, looking the past unhappy history of the Republic from its infancy to the present moment, it is boldly announced that this must be submitted to the supervision of the Congress, at Washington, or else is without effect."

In these distant terms, that party, constitution Convention and Government, and have finally, by their own hands, brought the State Constitution now being enacted.

Are we satisfied it will be pronounced non-Republican in form, and as there was no permission given to Maryland to change the form of Government guaranteed in 1789, and several changes have been made since that time without admission to the guarantee, for authority to go into operation, we expect that self-styled free, sovereign and independent State, to be proclaimed to be a state of constitutional anarchy. And the novel doctrine of heretofore unclaimed, unthought-of, untried, and untried, applies equally to New York, Massachusetts and to every other State, of whose section

There is scarcely a Commonwealth, which since 1789, has not revised, altered and changed its Constitution, and it is never before entertained by the wisest attorneys of a moral philosophy that these should be submitted to Congress for its approval or judgment.

The idea is too utterly without foundation for argument. It is only noticed because it is for the first time seriously advocated and pressed upon a party in the country who possess at present practically the reins of government.

If any thing can arouse the land to a knowledge of the dangers which threaten its liberties and menace our whole structure of Government, it should be a doctrine like this so boldly and defiantly announced.

It is true the Constitution as that Congress shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government. But the meaning of the provision is well known. At the time of its adoption, the country was just passing from a monarchical to a republican form of government. The States were about uniting for their mutual protection. Great tears were entertained from the intrigues and designs of foreign and antagonistic powers. The clause was inserted by which Congress, as the Representative of all the States, should stand pledged to guarantee to each the preservation of its republican form of government, and preserve these from any attempt at monarchy or overthrow. It was intended for the protection, and not the subversion, of the States, or of their then acknowledged republican governments.

At the resolution originally stood, it reads, "That a Republican Constitution and its executive laws ought to be guaranteed to each State by the United States."

In the debate which ensued in July, 1787, Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, said, "The object is merely to secure the States against dangerous commotions, insurrections and rebellions."

Col. Mason said the General Government should have the right to suppress rebellion against particular States, otherwise it must remain a passive spectator of its own subversion.

Mr. Gorham said that "an enterprising citizen might erect the standard of monarchy in a particular State, might gather together partisans from all quarters; might extend his views from State to State, and threaten to establish a tyranny over the whole, and the General Government be compelled to remain an inactive witness of its own destruction." Mr. Carroll thought that some such provision, essential, and that every State ought to wish for it.

The whole intent and meaning of this article in the Constitution was clearly to protect the States in their respective republican forms of Government against violence, either foreign or domestic.

The events, which are so surrounded are in sad contrast with the principles which this day commemorates.

When George Washington, on the 17th of September, 1787, transmitted to the Legislatures of the respective States for their ratification or rejection the Constitution which their Representatives had framed, he commended it as that which would promote the lasting welfare of the country and secure to the people peace and happiness.

Under that Constitution we may yet be a free, united and happy people. But, when it shall be set aside, the pillars of the temple will be removed and the crumbling edifice will become a memorial of freedom, overturned by faction.
