VOL. III. RALEIGH, N. C., MONDAY, AUGUST 26, 1867. NO. 16.

THE SENTINEL.

WM. B. PELL, Proprietor.

Correspondence from the "Springs."

CATAWBA, Aug. 23, 1867.

Gentlemen:—I promised to sketch for your amusement, uncle Stephen, our knight of the Bath, and as I have just parted with that sable functionary, I will pen his portrait while it is freshly imprinted upon the retina of a pair of eyes, that have "seed lots," as the aforesaid uncle Stephen would say. Fancy an aged Ethiopian of the color of a pickled walnut, short, thick set, and with arms and shoulders of inordinate length and breadth and greatly disproportioned to the rest of the body; place a round, hard looking head, with little or no intervention of neck, plumb on the shoulders, give it a forward inclination on his huge chest, ornament (?) this head with a broad flat nose, a thick blubby mouth, and a pair of sharp though sleepy eyes, fringe the square cheeks and cover the cranium with a coarse shock of kinky wool as white as snow, and you will have the material of uncle Stephen! His costume consists of a pair of pantaloons composed of faded jeans, which, by dint of much sitting upon and frequent hitchings up, have assumed a frayed appearance in "every principal part" and display to all beholders a pair of feet constructed on the broadest basis and generally guiltless of shoe or stocking. The feet are not the only exposure of which uncle Stephen is guilty, for, though he is clad, in addition to the jeans inexpressibles, in the whitest of osnaburg shirts, his arrangement of the front of it is of such a style, that I felt it my duty to propose a contribution for the purpose of presenting him with a set of studs. I do not know if the knight has heard of the fashion now prevalent among Parisian ladies, nor whether a desire to emulate them has caused the easy undress uniform he wears, but I do know that the small insects termed chigers abound in some portions of Catawba, and I have noticed that uncle Stephen's horny nails, like those of uncle Ned, are "as long as the cane in the brake," and seem equal to the annihilation of an army of "chigers." The sum and scope of Uncle Stephen's existence is comprised and contained in two fixed ideas, round which his thoughts slowly and sluggishly revolve. The first of these is the innate conviction that all female bathers are leagued in a conspiracy to defraud him and the bath-house of their inalienable prerogatives, and to obtain entrance into the latter without depositing the bit of card-board requisite to ensure lawful admission thereto. Never did Charon exact with more jealous care the penny without which no unhappy ghost could cross the Styx, than does uncle Stephen pounce upon the small ticket before mentioned, and never did joy equal his when, after an abstruse mathematical calculation, he makes the number of bathers agree with that of the cards entrusted to his charge. Then, and only then, he indulges in the second of his two ideas of duty—the deepest, most complete and sleepless of sleeps; he holds it as a fundamental doctrine, that every instant not occupied in watching that the bathers do not slip by him, as he sits on his post at the beginning of the bath-house bridge, should be passed in sleep. I question if uncle Stephen has ever read Saxe's inimitable homily on the virtues of sleep, but he certainly acts as if he had, and by his persistent somnolency, doubtless keeps himself from the commission of much mischief. He does well thus to restrain himself, for, sad as it is to state the fact, uncle Stephen has two faults, which somewhat tarnish his otherwise shining character. The first is a habit which has become second nature, of requesting, what Dickens calls, "testimonials of respect," or at least of worth, from all with whom he may be brought into contact; and the second is the equally fixed habit of expending such valuable testimonials in a fluid which, though of a sulphurous tendency, is not sulphur water.

No great man is without some failing, and perfection is incompatible with humanity, as these blemishes on the moral brightness of uncle Stephen are but as specks on the sun, or flaws in a black diamond.

Our acquaintance began in a misconception on the part of this ebony Argus, to the effect that I was desirous of taking a party past him, larger in numbers than the amount of tickets deposited in his outstretched paw. This mistake was a natural one, inasmuch as several ladies, who did not intend bathing, had gone along to see the fun in which they would not personally participate. In vain did I explain, and to no use did I argue; the one question was:

"Lor Missis, shure you don't want to cheat a ole nigger!"

I scorned the "old nigger" that cheating was not in my line, and appealed to his gallantry to have the obnoxious accusation removed. This seemed to move him; he gave an inarticulate grunt, then his eyes twinkled and a benign smile over spread his face as, seizing the scanty lock which kinked on his wrinkled forehead, he made me a profound obeisance and said in oily tone: "Missis, giv ole nigger som'ing to git ole nigger a dram!"

I represented the heinous wickedness of ole niggers taking drams, and suggested that the testimonial should be expended in tobacco, and then the following conversation ensued:

"Uncle Stephen, what do you think of freedom?" "W'all, Missis, I lows it's a right good thing, but I had a mitey good time at my ole master's in Prince Ed'ards county—I come from Virginey, I did, Missis."

"Uncle Stephen, what have you done for your country since you became free? Have you been to school?" "No, Missis, not yit, but I lows to git to Salisbury in de Winter and then I shall go to larning."

"That's right, uncle Stephen! You are waking your time now, and ought to be getting ready for Congress, or to be President. You know you are the equal of Mr. Lincoln, who set you free, and of all those people in Washington, and you ought to make things for your state in all they have no 'ob.' If you don't, what's the good of being a nigger?"

"Yes, missis, lows de Lord, so I is; I'se nobody, and I'll go to school as soon as I kin git to Salisbury!"

"How old are you, uncle Stephen?"

"I'se far turned on eighty, missis, and I 'lows to git my larning just as soon as I kin git to Salisbury!"

Here a fresh detachment of bathers came up and our colloquy ended. With the hope that Salisbury may afford all the learning of which uncle Stephen stands in need, to fit him for the long and honorable future before him, and the conviction that two of the qualifications he possesses, in so eminent a degree, cannot fail to secure his speedy political advancement,

I am, very truly,
