DAILY SENTINEL.

W. E. PELL, Proprietor.

A HAYTIEN WITNESS AGAINST GEN. HOWARD.

In one of his recent addresses, Gen. Howard drew a picture of the South, converted into a paradise by the hands of the pupils of the freedmen's bureau, educated by that institution into models of agricultural industry and thrift. It is the amiable anticipation of the pious head of the bureau that when the Southern States are "properly reconstructed," the landed estates of their white people will be broken up into small farms by a school tax so intolerable as to compel proprietors to sell to colored people on terms suitable to the latter.

This accomplished, a new and paradisaical era is to begin. He tells the country to look forward to the event with satisfaction and await results with confidence. But he is by no means precise in pointing out, the nature of the results that are to follow, and we would be remiss to leave uncorrected in this regard, did we not have before our minds some examples elsewhere, of a condition of things similar to that which Gen. Howard is bent on establishing in the South. One of these examples is the nigrification portion of Africa; another is Jamaica. But Hayti is the one which especially commends itself to notice in this connection, from the fact that we have the testimony of an intelligent and outspoken Haytian witness, a colored man, the editor of Le Peuple, a newspaper of Port-au-Prince, as to the effects of making his race unconditional lords of the soil, with every earthly encouragement and aid to become of all the world the most successful agriculturists. Listen to the colored editor of the Haytian newspaper: "It might be well questioned," he says, "that Hayti, in the midst of the best conditions in the world for producing everything from her own resources, is notwithstanding by a combination of sinister circumstances absolutely nothing in everything. What must be the inference, then, of one who dispassionately looks at the matter? Is it that this soil, so highly favored by nature, lacks an indispensable element, and that population, intelligent and well informed, is a necessity and a will? This element is labor; this desire is to do; this will is to succeed."

The colored journalist is especially indignant at the decay in Hayti of sugar production, in which at one time it surpassed all the other West India islands. "Is it not, in fact, deplorable," he says, "to see so ignorant as remarkable for its fertility, a country which once produced by itself as much sugar as all the surrounding colonies united, drawing from abroad the sugar needed for its own consumption, when it could import nothing but what its soil and its industry cannot supply, such objects as are necessary to the manufacture of sugar, like the air which we do not produce, but which, to support life, we must borrow from the atmosphere?" After further remarks, this Haytian journalist concludes that it is only by awakening in the colored people of Hayti a moral force not now manifested, that the island can be saved from relapsing into a wilderness and its inhabitants into barbarism. "Without this moral force," he observes, "which these robust laborers lack, what remains for them more brutal force to do but glut passions which long continued idleness engenders?"

We trust that Gen. Howard, when here after sketching his anticipated paradise in the South, will, for the sake of truth, if not of poetry, fill up his outlines with illustrations drawn from the realities of Hayti. — A. O. COOPER.

A MISSING REPORT.

"The telegraph has informed the public somewhat with reference to the various reports of the Departments which will be presented to Congress. There is something said about what will be reported from the various ministerial bureaus, the War Department and other official institutions. There is one thing about which nothing has been hinted. There is one thing concerning which there is a profound silence. It is something of the highest importance. Hence the absence of all mention of it is inexplicable. What we refer to is the war in the South."

"As everybody knows, there are five military departments extending through ten States. There are five military officials of the rank of Major General. Each of these military officers has a force under his command. What we want to know is, what these five gallant captains have been doing in these five Southern departments with the five armies under their command."

"Of course, history of the performances of these five armies, after the battle of Five Forks, will be of surpassing interest. It would include heroic exploits without number, blundered without end, and unequalled daring without limit. It is this history, embodied in the form of a report, that we miss from among those announced as forthcoming at the beginning of the session in December."

"Peculiar thrill with enthusiasm when it reads how Crook crossed the Hudson, and how, a little later, he carried the war to Africa. In the same way would this generation become 'entangled' could it know all that has been performed by the patriots who have held the South. We shall never know all; we can never know all. Exploits have occurred about dangerous hemispheres, and in menacing proximity to kitchens, garnished with warlike women, that need only be related to render their actors forever famous. Newspapers have been charged up, and many a courageous white man has been made to experience the value of the Federal arms."

"Look at the Herculean nature of what has been accomplished by these five major generals! An entire population composed of negroes has been raised from its dead, thrown forward to the registry lists, supplied with arms, and forced to remember their names and to vote the Radical ticket. At the same moment that this colossal task was being performed, another population of whites has been suppressed, held fast by the registry lists, deprived from voting by every possible means; and thereby have the Radicals been able to carry all the Southern States."

"What we want is a report of these operations! Let us know how the whites were bullied and bayoneted into quietness, and how tens of thousands of negroes, who knew no difference between the Constitution of the United States and the autocracy of Russia, were armbled and drilled so as to vote the Radical ticket to a man. Let us know how much injustice, oppression and suffering were required to bring all this about. All these things, faithfully told, would be as full of interest as the thrilling account which Pope gave of his pursuit and capture of 20,000 rebels after the evacuation of Corinth.

RESTORATION NOT RECONSTRUCTION.—We are glad to see the Radical journals coming round to reasonable views. The New York Tribune, in reference to the action of Congress on financial affairs, can say that neither "expansion" nor "contraction" is exactly the thing to restore the country to prosperity. It is:

"What is needed most is the reconstruction of the South and the termination of the bitterness growing out of the war.—With this squared, the premium on gold will fast disappear, and there will spring up in Europe a demand for United States bonds at low interest sufficient to enable the Treasury to commence other payments with no fear of another suspension."

We agree with this, entirely, and also with the comment of the New York Express on this subject, that there will never be peace nor prosperity under mere reconstruction. What is wanted is restoration—the restoration of the South to all its rights and privileges under the Constitution. Nothing short of that will do, and that, it seems, is never to come so long as the Radical party is in power. So says the Baltimore Sun.
