repeal of the "iron clad" but only would be a necessary accompaniment of the removal of the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment; and to round off and complete the work of pacification, the new President should publish a universal amnesty, and cover even Jefferson Davis with the mantle of executive clemency. After such a pacification the country would be convinced that the era of strife had really closed, and that good will was at last to be regarded in good faith as by-gones. The long recess of Congress, which would immediately follow, would enable the country to settle into repose for the first time since the convulsions and agonies of the last eight years. The opening of the Pacific Railroad in the course of the summer would bring together a great number of leading North-west and leading Southern men, and the gathering of such an occasion, with the peace giving President himself of the party, and abundance of congratulatory speeches being along the way, according to our American custom, would mark the era of good feeling and national unity. The first national convention should be held at that time, and should take the attitude of the whole country in the absence of political excitement, regarding the material interests of our magnificent future; and by the time Congress would again meet, the people would be in a temper of mind favorable to the solution of the great financial problems which force themselves upon us upon public attention. General Grant might, in the meanwhile, avail himself of the absence of the soundest and best instructed fiscal leads in the country, (who would gladly give him their assistance) and be prepared to recommend in his annual message, a fiscal policy as judicious as his anxiety policy was wise and patriotic. Congress would evidently do nothing to reform the currency at the present session, and the postponement to a little importance, considering that a full revival of the cotton crop is one of the main prerequisites to specie payments. Let the planters be encouraged to put in their seed in the Spring with new courage and hope; let it grow during a summer of real peace; and after the harvest, let the new President, aided by the wisdom of experienced advisers, lay before Congress recommendations which shall make him the inaugurator of prosperity as he had previously been the author of peace. We have sketched the things at which General Grant may reasonably aspire in the first year of his administration—a policy which would make it the dawn of a brighter era. We have but faint hopes, however, that he will witness anything but great opportunities slighted by a President who does not understand his epoch and is unequal to his responsibilities.
