JOSIAH TURNER, Jr., EDITOR.

From the Indiepeal Courier Journal.
THE RESULT OF FORNEY'S SOUTH ERN TOUR.

Within the last few weeks, it has been quite the fashion for Radical editors of the North to visit the South, where they all seem to have met with very flattering receptions. One of the first to go was, we believe, Mr. Medill, of the Chicago Trident, a able editor, who had probably done more than any other editor in the North-west to excite popular feeling against the South and to bring up the people of that section in the unjust and oppressive measures under which they are and have long been suffering. He was kindly and handsomely received wherever he went, especially in Mobile. In his intercourse with the prominent Democrats of that city, he stated freely that he had been greatly mistaken as to Southern views and feelings and had consequently committed errors in his paper, but that he would at once rectify the wrongs he had done. He did, in his editorial correspondence, change his style and tone considerably, but we couldn't see that the change was at all adapted to do the South a good. He denounced the carpet-baggers as a wretched nuisance, with which the South did not have and ought not to have any patience but, in order to keep his bitter partisanship above suspicion, he made the false and absurd declaration, that carpet-bagging was "a legacy of President Johnson" to the South, and he suggested a mode in which he would have the correction or the mitigation of the curse effected or attempted. He hinted not at any remedy or palliation. He was willing that the causes which had operated and were operating so disastrously should remain at work. He hinted no doubt or misgiving as to the expediency and wisdom of any one of the long and dark series of ultra Radical measures that he and his party had supported, and, up to this time, he had published no word implying a doubt that everything which the Radical party has done and everything which it contemplates to ward the South is right and proper. He is gentle enough in language, but harsh in policy. He would have the Southern people believe that only under tyranny and oppression can their prosperity and greatness be permanently established. Did the leading Democrats of the South dream that they were securing so valuable a friend by their liberal attentions and elegant hospitalities?

After the editor of the Chicago Trident came Col. Forney, of the Philadelphia Press and Washington Chronicle, and his friends. Among all the malignant defamers and vilifiers of the South Forney had, for four years, been pre-eminent. There had been no clamor against the South in which his voice had not been loudest and shrillest. No policy of hate or vengeance against the South had ever been proposed which he had not supported. No Southern abasement, humiliation, degradation had ever been invented that he had failed to recommend as right and just. He had never hesitated to take part with the worst Southerners against the best Southern white men. He had never in any case recognized a Southern negro as wrong or a Southern Democrat as right. But, as we said, he and a number of his Radical friends recently made up their minds to take a Southern tour. We could not help thinking that such an enterprise on their part involved an amount of effrontery truly amazing, and we wondered what would happen. They set forth with a grand flourish of trumpets, causing proclamation everywhere to be made that it was their purpose to do justice to the unhappy South, and to place her right in the eyes of the North and of mankind. The great and afflicted South has a heart, which, although covered with deep wounds, tempts forth with real kindness to even seeming kindness. Forney and his friends were greeted everywhere throughout their tour not as the past but as the future benefactors of the South. Wherever they went, loud cries of welcome were raised. They were greeted and feasted. Speeches were made to them in the name and behalf of municipalities. At every point, the honor and favor of their stay for the longest possible time were solicited. It seemed as if enough could not be done to show the enthusiastic popular appreciation of their valued presence. More than once we ventured to inquire very decidedly in our Southern friends, what we thought of their manifestations, and some of them, especially out of the cities, spoke very plainly upon the subject, but the glorification of the Northern Abolitionists continued generally without shame to the end of their tour. One thing however may be said in extenuation of the unwholesome spirit exhibited by the Southern people, having suffered and still suffering terribly from the misrepresentations of their political and sectional enemies, one of the chief of whom was then among them with the avowed intent of reporting for the information of the North what he might see and hear, they could not, even from natural sources of resentment, easily resist the inclination to endeavor by every means in their power to bring about the removal of the prejudices and antipathies that existed against them. But they soon saw the mortifying result of all the efforts that had taxed their pride if not their self respect so severely. Mr. Forney, by the letters that he wrote in regard to them, injured them to the extent of his influence instead of rendering them benefits they had expected from him. They were making every exertion to secure immigration from the North, deeming it absolutely vital to their interests, but he warned the people, that, if they associate themselves together and go in such numbers as to form communities of their own, depending upon each other for business and social enjoyment, as the Southern people would not admit them to terms of social equality or willingly have anything to do with them as incendiaries or the followers of any kind of treason whatever. All the Southern papers say that this is utterly false, and certainly no falsehood could be calculated to inflict upon the South a deeper and deadlier injury. The author of it says in his last Southern letter, although similar statements of his have been repeatedly and in the strongest terms contradicted by Southern papers. "In all the reconstructed States, the war upon the white Republicans is unceasing, whether they are a majority or new comers. They have much to endure, and when we see how much they are persecuted in business, in character, and in every relation in life, I realize what a grim work they have to bear, and how much they despise the countenances of the Government and their compatriots in the North. Most of these men are citizens of exalted worth. All of them condone our cause, by submission to their status; but they are controlled by sincere convictions, and they stand to their game." The writer goes on to say that the immigrants to the South, and their descendants, Republicans can be sustained "only by the present aid of the General Government," and he italicizes the remark in order to impress it clearly upon the minds of his readers. He adds, "I trust that the General Government shall keep armed occupation of the South."

And this is the result of Forney & Co's famous Southern expedition, from which the Southerners people, cut off, have, from hope in so many other quarters, been venturing to expect so much. It is for this that they have rejoiced and dattered and feasted and pampered an old, unprincipled, malevolent and remorseless enemy, rendering him still almost as bad as might appropriately be called almost as bad in character. They thought that they were doing what was best, but we trust that they have learned from their last bitter and disgusting experience what they should have known from previous experiences scarcely less bitter and disastrous.
