ADVENTURES OF CONFEDERATE BLOCKADE RUNNERS.

HOW A CONFEDERATE BLOCKADE RUNNER HOODWINKED A BRITISH NAVAL OFFICER.

The "Kate" was as clean as a new pin, officers and men dressed for company, and Captain Tom, with the easy courtesy of a man of the world, quickly made every individual on board feel, as if he, she and it were the town personal guests. No man knows how to plant and reap blessings better than Tom Oakey. The fine band of the second West India Regiment—all blacks—was on board, and added to the zest of the occasion with music that would not be discreditable to the Tuscan Theatre of Hyde Park. I ought to tell you, by the way, that this regiment is composed entirely of negroes, every one of whom is a picked man, six feet in height, and when they appear on parade, dressed in their Zouave uniform, and drilled so that they move like a vast machine, there is not a more striking military spectacle on a small scale to be seen on this mundane sphere. The officers are all white, and, as a general thing, educated.

After steaming around for three or four hours, we ran up to the eastward and came to anchor. The awnings were spread and the decks cleared for a dinner. Meanwhile, the steward and his assistants had prepared the handsomest banquet which the place and circumstances could afford; and if ever the royal road to people's hearts was found through the human stomach, it was certainly discovered on that occasion. The dignitaries of the island were all graciousness, and as the wine flowed and tongues loosened, I saw the target, at which Captain Tom was driving his hospitable lance.

It's so easy to blind a man's eyes with a good dinner. In nine cases out of ten, a basket of champagne will warp a man's conscience to the most accommodating degree; and it has not, subsequently proved the fact that when a government official is concerned in contraband transactions, the cloak he wraps around him is like that of charity itself—"it covereth a multitude of sins."

An evidence of the intensity of feeling at this time among islanders, was furnished on our trip back in the afternoon. The mate of a vessel lying at one of the wharves, seeing us approaching with the English colors at our masthead, ran up to his own fore peak the cross of St. George beneath the stars and stripes. This act so enraged the citizens that they went on board of the American vessel, tore down the American flag, and in a moment rent it in a thousand tatters. On landing, the officers of the West India Regiment, who had been our guests, likewise excited at what they deemed an insult to the Queen, rushed into the crowd, gathered all the fragments they could obtain and carried them to their quarters. The upshot of the affair was, that in the course of an hour the captain of the vessel came on board of the "Kate" and apologized for what he called the unwarrantable act of his drunken mate. Tom, as a matter of course, took the apology with all the dignity of a bloody-minded and indignant Englishman, and was not appeased until the skipper balanced accounts with a case of the best Cheshire in port. Consul Sam. Whiting—a jolly good fellow, by the way—was not so easily satisfied, and making complaint the next day to the Governor of the island, every blood West Indian who had a fragment of the unfortunate banner as big as a tea cent piece, was obliged to deliver the same to the irate representative of the United States of America, after which, suitable apology was made by the authorities of the island.

The way was now paved for the accomplishment of our object, which was to obtain a cargo of arms and ammunition of war, that had been ordered by the Confederate Government, and which, it was vitally important should be placed in the hands of our Western army, then in the vicinity of Corinth, with the least possible delay.

This war material had been brought to Nassau by an English brig, and a part of her cargo was unloaded at the dock, but as suspicion had been aroused that things were not exactly what they seemed, she had dropped down some distance from the town and lay in the stream awaiting our arrival. As many vessels were constantly coming and going, these movements occasioned no especial comment. In two days after our excursion party we coaled, and steaming up to the dock took in the portion of cargo which had been deposited as above described. We then dropped down alongside of the English brig.

The custom house officer detached to attend us, was as black as your hat, but nevertheless, a courteous and intelligent official. Oakey had industriously cultivated this fellow's acquaintance, and he was so completely magnetized by the peculiar manipulations of the old blockade runner, that he never saw anything which was not proper to be seen, except twenty dollar gold pieces or a bottle of wine, and, for all Confederate purposes, was as blind as an owl in the sunlight.

The arms and accoutrements were packed in barrels and marked "Hardware," and in all probability the custom house officials aforesaid, to this present day, prepared to swear the most horrible oath that they contained in truth fully legitimate spades and shovels, manufactured in Springfield, Mass.

We had been hurrying in the cargo for about three hours, when the captain of an English gunboat rowed alongside and came on board. He was a gruff, sourly old fellow, of the bull-dog stripe, chunky, broad shouldered, yellow haired, and red faced, with those pretty blossoms on his rosy features which are the unmistakable symptoms of a devotee at the shrine of John Barleycorn. Tom knew his man to a nicety, and gauged his mood; and you never saw one of the feline species proceed to play with a captive mouse more adroitly than was done on this important occasion.

Vast interests were at stake. None knew better than Captain Oakey that perhaps the Confederate success in the daily expected battle of Shiloh depended on the safe transit and delivery at those arms; and no man could possibly feel the responsibility of the hour more gravely than himself, for before our departure, letter upon letter had been sent to Charleston from both officers of the army and of the government, begging us by every consideration to forward them with as much dispatch. "Good morning, Captain, I am glad to see you," was Oakey's cordial hand greeting. They had met before on previous visits of our blockade runners to Nassau.

"Morn'n', morn'n', morn'n'," growled the old sea dog, extending a fat, freckled hand, that looked as if at some time it had been the flipper of a turtle.

"Just in time," said Tom. "I've just ordered a t-dy; d'ye ever drink?"

"Drink sir, drink sir, aye, aye, by Jove try me sir; I'm like the fire-brick sir, the Irishman; it can't drink down it, make me drink, sir, make me drink." After these pyrotechnic ejaculations, the venerable mariner gave vent to a series of abdominal cackles, which shook his corporosity like the premonitory tremors of a young earthquake.

"Walk aft," said Tom.

"By the way," remarked the old salt as they moved towards the cabin, "the gov'ner yonder has a fancy that you are shipping arms for the Confederates—ha! ha! good joke, sir, good joke; shipping arms under Her Majesty's nose. Wanted me to come off and see what you're doing—egad, sir, what you're doing. And I've come, I've come, sir."

"That's right," said Tom, "I'm glad to welcome you. Look around for yourself; there's a pile of dow, some shovels and spades, and when you go below we'll have the boxes opened, and I'll show you the prettiest lot of hardware ever shipped from Great Britain. But come along to the cabin and let's drink first."

With that Oakey ushered his visitor into the private cabin of the "Kate," and closed the door on that side of the ship from which she was every moment receiving her warlike cargo.

"What shall it be? I've a little of all sorts." "Take some champagne," said Tom.

"A little brandy first, cap'n—brandy first. Brandy's a sheet anchor, cap'n, a sheet anchor—no water, thank'ee, no water, they don't agree, as the Irishman said, when he gave the Pope a recipe for making punch."

"How was that?" asked Tom.

"First pour in the brandy, then add the sugar, but, 'gad, sir, every drop of water you put in after that, spoils the punch, sir, spoils the punch."

Oakey plied his guest with questions, and kept him busy with answers, every three or four minutes putting in a liquid punctuation point in the shape of brandy, and now of champagne, until the British captain was in an uproarious state of personal felicity. At first he was strictly and most impartially neutral. The very essence of a representative Briton, dutifully engaged; but the more he practiced multiplication with Johannes Barleycorn the kindler grew his sympathies, until finally kindled into enthusiasm, about fifteen glasses deep, he threw his arms affectionately around Tom, and exclaimed with intoxicated pathos, "Never mind 'ardware, cap'n—never mind! Ye see, ye see, hic—it's all right—by Jove, all right, pic. I'm with ye, hic—with ye 'ert and soul, by Jove—'ert and soul, hic." The last words were grandly emphatic, accompanied with a stroke on Tom's back, which the old salt doubtless intended to be particularly fraternal, but which Tom avers, to this day, was very much like the descending stroke of a spile driver, and always gives him a rheumatic twinge to think about.

Three or four more drinks did the business, by which time Tom was safe from all fears of inspection.

Between the Otard on the one hand, and the necessary official dignity to be preserved on the other, the old Briton, as he leaned lovingly on Tom's arm to the passage from the cabin to the ship's ladder, found it exceedingly difficult to maintain his specific gravity. As he rolled over the side, his parting words were, "Her Majesty's gunboat after 'ardware—ha, ha, ha—that is a good joke, sir, by Jove, hic; God bless ye, cap'n, hic—an' safe y'voyage—safe v'yage back." When last seen the worthy captain was stretched out in the stern sheets of his cutter, snoring an unconscious accompaniment to "When the swallows homeward fly."

We had now only to finish loading, get our clearance from the custom house, and turn our bow homeward. The "Kate," although a trim and beautiful boat, was not the fastest of our blockade runners, but fortunately we were not put to a trial of speed on the return trip. Our cargo being too important to risk the ordinary risks incurred in running the blockade of Charleston or Wilmington, Captain Oakey determined to land at Smyrna, on the coast of Florida, which was safely done. The Confederate authorities, duly advised of our arrival, then took the cargo in hand, and in the course of ten or fifteen days the arms and ammunition were on their way, in hundreds of wagons, across the country, to the nearest railroad that would convey the long expected aid to the army of the West. I need only add that they reached Corinth in full time, and the battle of Shiloh was fought in part with the "Hardware" over which the sturdy John Bullman had been made so boisterously fuddled.

Tom left the ship at Smyrna in charge of the first officer, and came to Charleston, and so ended that trip.
