JOSIAH TURNER, Jr., EDITOR.

GRANT AND THE GOLD RING.

Mr. James Fisk, Jr., has published an extraordinary series of statements, which we transferred to our columns the other day. We assume these to be true because, first, they are not in conflict with any of the known facts of the transaction to which they refer; second, they are quite consistent with what we know of the characters of the persons of whom they treat; and, third, they are corroborated by the statement officially promulgated by President Grant, so far as that statement goes.

If they are true, and if Mr. Corbin was, as he has publicly denied being, the real organizer of the recent corner in gold and in the intimate confidence of the persons who admit themselves to have been concerned in that movement, what follows?—Mr. Corbin is not known in Wall street so well, nor has he any such financial reputation, as would lead astute operators to give full confidence to his financial ideas, or to defer their own practised judgments, in their own speciality, to his crude theories. Neither is he a capitalist, so far as we know, of such pith and moment that his money was needed by men who had control of any number of millions without him. What was it, then, that induced Messrs. Fisk and Gould and the rest to follow the lead of a man in whose judgment it does not appear that they had any particular reason for confiding, and whose money it does not appear that they stood in need. Simply this: Mr. Cobbin is the brother-in-law of the President of the United States. As such, he was supposed to possess the confidence of that officer and to have knowledge of his intentions. The sole value of Mr. Corbin to the bulls lay in their belief, first, that he knew the Executive mind; next, that he was willing to sell that knowledge for a share in the profits of a commercial speculation; and, third, that the President was willing to have him.

This last is the shameful part of the story. The facts which have come out about Mr. Corbin's letter to President Grant, which Messrs. Fisk and Gould were so anxious to have that officer receive that they sent it to him by a special emissary, bring afresh upon Mr. Grant anew the dark suspicion, which the World at first expressed its utter disbelief in, of his complicity in the designs of the gold gamblers. It behooves him to explain what that letter was, and what his answer to it. But, in any case, what a scandal and shame it is that the contrivers of the corner should have, as it is undeniable that they did have, grounds for believing that he might be induced to join their ring.

Since the beginning of President Grant's administration he has been bestowing the patronage of his office with an utter disregard of any considerations of fitness, or of anything else except that the appointees were either his relations or his benefactors. It is not proved that he has ever refused anything to one who had given him anything, or who could establish the remotest relationship to him, except in one instance. That was the case wherein he was applied to by Mr. Fisk, Jr., for a little official and private information in return, it would seem, for a free ride on a Sound steamer.—Put upon anybody else, this would have been a gross insult. But, really, is Mr. Fisk to be considered culpable for not knowing exactly the point at which the Spartan virtue of Grant began? As a brown-stone front is to a seat in the Cabinet, so, Mr. Fisk, Jr., might not unreasonably have worked out his problem in proportion, is a free ride on a steamboat to a little bit of information to impart which not impoverished Grant and made Fisk, Jr., rich indeed. But the gratitude of Grant in this instance alone failed to overcome his sense of what is "fair." He did not suggest, so far as appears, that the price was too small, though it may fairly be supposed that he thought so. He only tried to convince Mr. Fisk, Jr., and succeeded in convincing him, that what he proposed was "not quite fair." He did not treat the proposition as an insult. It would have been absurd if he had. It is no more a dereliction of duty to give a man information which you have no right to impart in return for favors than it is, in return for favors, to put a man in a place which he is unfit to fill. General Grant could not resent such propositions, and he did not resent this one, because his whole official course has laid him open to such propositions. When a President accepts promiscuous pecuniary favors he most know, unless he is stool, that the giver expects a return. A New York newspaper forbids its reporters to accept free rides on railways or to eat gratuitous viands at hotels, because it knows that a return may be expected from carriers and from publicans. General Grant takes such things although he must know that such returns may be expected. The difference is that a different sense of dignity and decency obtains in the conduct of New York newspapers and in the conduct of General Grant.

When Mr. Grant's gratitude thus unexpectedly and unprecedentedly failed, what was left but to assail his other weakness—his love of his kin? By engaging the cooperation of Mr. Corbin, the "ring" seem to have thought that they could work upon it. By promising profit to Mr. Corbin, they appealed to both the consanguineous and the pecuniary affections of Mr. Grant. It is due to Mr. Grant's character to say that in this instance both appeals failed. But is due to the judgment of the managers of the combination to say that neither ever failed before.

Grant's fate has indeed been melancholy and monitory. He has been scarcely six months in office. For during part time he has managed to fill the public service with a horde of flagrant incompetents and to exercise the vastest scandalous system of nepotism that was ever known, except in a decayed dynasty. And he has returned more favors for what he must have known were meant for bribes than all our previous Presidents put together. He has made his name a byword by deserting his duty and roaming about the country taking his pleasures publicly and continually. He has let himself out as a cheap and profitable adjustment to every hotel keeper who chose to keep him. He has incurred the unfounded but reasonable suspicion of being in complicity with a set of men whose business is to gamble with the public credit which his business is to uphold. And he has now sunk to furnish the matter of a small sensation to a moribund puppenny newspaper.—N. Y. Nation.
