J. THOMAS THOMAS

The New Orleans Post, in noticing the death of Gen. George H. Thomas, brings to mind several things that are more creditable to the memory of the deceased than otherwise. The Post says: At West Point, Thomas spent his early years, and graduated with honors as an ensign in the 6th Artillery. He was distinguished for bravery, and for his conduct was awarded, by a special order from the State of Virginia, the formation of two regiments of cavalry, under the command of Gen. Sherman, during the administration of Gen. Pierce, in February, 1846, to the command of the 1st Cavalry, which he held until the 15th of August, 1846, when he was transferred to the 2nd Cavalry, of which A. Sully Johnston was made colonel, and Robert E. Lee lieutenant colonel. This regiment was assigned to duty in Texas, and as the sectional issues in Congress then were rapidly moving toward the "hickory" and "bearing," they soon became the objects of discussion at the mess tables of the army officers, between natives of the North and South. On all such occasions, George H. Thomas distinguished himself by his bold advocacy of the rights of the South; wherever they were called in question, taking the very extreme of Southern rights' theories, and of adherence to the doctrines of the Calhoun party as to constitutional limitations on the powers of the Federal Government with respect to the institutions of various States. He was so open in his views and advocacy on this question, that he was called by some persons the apostle of secession in the army. When the crisis came, at last, he manifested great impatience to leave the Federal army and join that of the South; and it is known to many officers on the ground that no less a person than Robert E. Lee advised him to resign, and that, in consequence of waiting until the final order, he had been promoted to the rank of colonel. But he properly resigned his commission, and proceeded to Richmond to offer his services to Virginia and the Confederacy. Whether he did this directly and in unmistakable terms is somewhat uncertain; but during the war the Richmond Examiner repeatedly asserted that the latter was exact in which he had done so. We have heard, however, that when informed of the fact, after the war closed, by an old army comrade, who claimed to be a Confederate, he denied the truth. In this, as it may be, Thomas left Richmond on his way North; he was alleged to bring his wife, who was a New York lady, within the Confederate states, but he never returned, except as a son. The resignation of Johnston and Lee had made him a full colonel of cavalry, and adding to the influence of his Northern wife, or to considerations of material interest, he set on foot the "movement" of his resignation, and all his former political prejudices, and, therefore, as long as the struggle continued, showed himself one of the most bitter, unrelenting and ungenerous foes of his native State and her sisters known in its history. His career in the Union army afforded full evidence of the truth of the old English saying, "that one renegade is worse than ten Turks," as the world has ever known. Apparently he took particular delight in destroying Southern property, and in inflicting upon them the full measure of the horrors and inhumanities of war. Never during the contest, or since it closed, did he fail to misrepresent, or to slander the adherents of the Confederacy, particularly those in Kentucky and Tennessee, where most of his services was performed. Stained, however, as he was by the infamy of secession, he was not without conspicuous qualities. He was a brave, fearless soldier, and a good disciplinarian, and won the admiration and respect of his troops. Stern as his persistent nature was, he was not the cold butcher that Grant, Sherman and Sheridan showed themselves to be. He never descended to the level of Butler, Dow and some other Federal officers, by stealing private property from the inhabitants of the country which he occupied, for his own use. He never allowed himself to be bullied by fanatical men, or to be influenced and deluded by women. In short, as to all which we think was the most liberal Southern journal to say in his behalf, and we say it cheerfully as his rightful due.
