COTTON IS KING.

A friend, the whose judgment we have great respect, reports to us that the State of Texas alone has a capacity to grow cotton to the extent of 15,000,000 bales, on as many acres of land, and half as many, on another 10,000,000 acres. These acres, however, are, in the main, wholly unavailable without labor, an immense amount of labor, and labor of much more steadiness of purpose or reliability than African or negro labor. What Texas is capable of producing in the way of cotton reminds one of the immense efforts made in times past to deprive the United States of her natural advantages as a cotton producing country. To this end the slave traffic was first encouraged and then abolished, and it is curious to open the book of the past and read the part acted by Great Britain in connection with the traffic. The British enjoyed the monopoly from 1713, securing it from Spain, which had earned by it over $204,000,000, and selling it to Spain again, in 1789, for $500,000. It was not planted upon our own shores until 1620, when a Dutch vessel introduced a cargo of slaves into the James River, and there first planted American slavery. Great Britain, however, pursued this traffic no longer than it was for her interest, and in 1808 both the U. S. and Great Britain put an end to it. The British policy was to accomplish by freedom what had failed in a state of slavery. How best to secure the productions of the tropics, and of cotton especially, was the end in view. England got rid of her own slaves, and left the traffic with Spain, Brazil being then a Spanish Colony, and with Portugal. The effect of British Emancipation was to reduce the exports about one-fourth of what they were when slavery existed in the Islands. What Great Britain lost, those who continued the traffic gained, and hence Great Britain became more intensely anti-slavery than ever, and sought by means of tropical free labor to compete with the tropical slave labor of other nations. In the interests of commerce, Great Britain did not hesitate to carry her banners wherever it was possible to sail a ship or plant a colony. In time, after nearly 25 years of war, abundance succeeded want, but the struggle was a fierce one at times, and full of artifice. Thus she took slaves, taken from the Spanish, Portuguese and Brazilian traders, and sent them as apprentices to the British West India planters. As the eagle will not sell its plumage by plunging into the sea to secure its prey, but wins the falsework of the plunder which his greater courage has secured from the sea, so Great Britain could buy and sell of those engaged in the slave trade, but dare not indulge in the traffic herself. She believed, too, that one free laborer was worth the labor of two slave laborers. The facts were that British capital had been reduced $750,000,000 by British Emancipation, while the tropical production had been increased from $75,000,000 to $300,000,000 annually, and reduced by emancipation in the West Indies from $750,000,000 to $650,000,000. Since then $4,000,000,000 of capital has been invested in slaves alone. The West Indies, however, lost 100,000 laborers in 20 years by emancipation, besides expending $100,000,000 to remunerate the planters, and $100,000,000 for an armed repression of the slave trade. And during this time Africa had been robbed of 5,000,000 slaves, or since 1620. No wonder that Great Britain, having thus begun the work of emancipation and lost hundreds of millions by it, was determined to destroy slavery and the traffic in slaves everywhere.

To this end came the war upon slavery in the United States, where cotton as the product of slave labor, was king. Slavery could be destroyed. Cotton might be cultivated cheaper, if not of as good a quality in the East and West Indies and in Africa. Cotton had nearly ceased as an export in the British West Indies in 1840. When the U. S. grew, in 1860, 1,767,686,339 pounds, the British West Indies grew but half a million pounds in 1840, and none in 1860.

The rebellion succeeded in destroying the old labor system of the South, to the delight of Great Britain and to the gratification of all the foreign powers. We do not expect to see what the Earl of Dartmouth long ago predicted, that the negroes will be a power in the hands of England to restrain Americans, nor that they will be Republicans, as intimated, but we have seen one-third of the cotton crop of 1860 yield more money than the full crop of 1860. If these prices could be kept up, the $4,000,000,000 lost in capital would be made up in increased prices—but this can hardly be. But as God sometimes makes the wrath of men to praise him, so emancipation produced by war, will in the end profit the South more than the North, or any other section of the world. Our cotton lands all remain, and are capable of supplying, moreover, the cotton demand of the world. Cotton in some way will still be king for all time, and for the benefit of the whole country, is some system of labor better than slavery was, and better than the present system of labor at the hands of freedmen is.

We condemn these statistics from elaborate tables, as showing the battle of nations in the past, mainly in the interest of cotton, and, as a consequence, in the interest of slavery.

A very remarkable man died recently in Galveston, Texas. We allluded to Hon. David G. Burnet, who, upon the termination of the war, visited Washington, having been elected to the United States Senate. Mr. Burnet was the son of the Surgeon-General of the American army of the Revolution, a brother of the venerable Judge Burnet, of Cincinnati, and a relative of the celebrated Chancellor Kent of New York. He was born in 1790 in New Jersey. He is said to have begun in his early youth the life of daring adventure and vicissitude which characterized him until late in the afternoon of life. When the struggle for Independence began in the South American States, he repaired to their camps and fought for their cause. The Texan revolution then breaking out, he resorted to that field, where he distinguished himself for intrepidity and sagacity. He successfully competed with Houston for the Presidency of the new Republic, and thus became its first Chief Magistrate. His name was held in reverence during the war, though he was said to have freely animadverted upon the secession movement. His funeral was marked by imposing solemnities, official and private, and the Galveston papers bear testimony to the honor in which he was held by his fellow citizens.
